All of them were present at the riding tracks, where they had a clear look of the fierce battle that had gone down between formidable foes on horseback. Fei Sheng’s reputation among the Imperial Bodyguards was not one to be trifled with, and he had also previously rendered meritorious service serving under Shen Zechuan. Huo Lingyun could not afford to shoulder the blame for offending him.

Kong Ling covered his mouth with a handkerchief and set aside his chopsticks. “Since His Lordship did not say a word about it, there’s no way anyone can kick up a commotion about this incident. You should not belittle Qiao Tianya either. He naturally must have his strengths for His Lordship to value and respect him to such an extent.”

Kong Ling had the clearest idea of what Shen Zechuan was thinking, having already figured him out. This horse race might have been a spur-of-the-moment idea, but the Prefectural Lord’s awarding of reward was not. Fei Sheng took credit for risking his life to protect the Prefectural Lord before, and then he had the tangible result to show for as the attendant officer in the taking down of Fanzhou. No doubt Shen Zechuan would put Fei Sheng to use somewhere more suitable, but at the same time, Shen Zechuan would not let Fei Sheng get a monopoly on power either. He had to simultaneously mobilize Qiao Tianya and Huo Lingyun so that these three people would form an iron triangle of a powerful trio who mutually held each other in check under his command. The outcome of today's horse race was exactly as the Prefectural Lord expected.

Shen Zechuan drew a clear distinction between his personal relations and official business. From the Imperial Bodyguards to the Six Prefectures, he was in the process of quietly establishing an equilibrium of power imbued with checks and balances. Shen Zechuan was not as forceful and striking as Xiao Chiye was when it came to the management of his subordinates, but he always remained securely seated at the peak, holding every single subordinate firmly in the palm of his hand as he had them achieve a delicate balance.

Kong Ling could not help but sigh ruefully as he thought to this point. Qi Huilian truly was the teacher of the emperor.

Shen Zechuan tapped the chess piece as he played a game against Xiao Chiye. They had rekindled an interest in it after the last round in Yuanzhuo's residence and were presently sitting around digesting their meals.

"What happened with Qiao Tianya was not in the cards," Xiao Chiye said. "Seeing how he made no attempt to vie in Cizhou, I even suspected that he had already seen through the secular world and was on the verge of renouncing himself from the pursuit of fame and fortune."

"I had the same sentiments." With his fingertips, Shen Zechuan turned around the chess piece that was cold to the touch. "But opportunities abound everywhere in life. There's always light at the end of the tunnel."

Xiao Chiye propped his arms on his knees and gave the Prefectural Lord his undivided attention.

Shen Zechuan set the chess piece down. "Qiao Tianya was a Vice Commander in the Imperial Bodyguards who could even take the liberty to mobilize the Imperial Bodyguards back then when he apprehended you at the Nanlin Hunting Grounds. This in itself is evident of Ji Lei's preferential treatment of him. Even as an official slapped with a crime, he could eke out a spot for himself in Qudu and one-up Fei Sheng. To be able to do that, he can't do without both craftiness and drive. My guess is that he bowed out in Cizhou because of Yuanzhuo's debilitating health, but despite his desire to retreat, Yuanzhuo pushed him back into the game."

Shen Zechuan hesitated over Huo Lingyun's placement when Fanzhou scored a great victory. At that time, Yao Wenyu proposed to place Huo Lingyun into the Imperial Bodyguards. As long as Shen Zechuan agreed, he would have to put Qiao Tianya to use again, because Huo Lingyun could not hold Fei Sheng in check in the Imperial Bodyguards.

"Both of them sure are interesting." At this point, Xiao Chiye remembered the Venerable Master Yideng of whom there had been no traces of for a long time. "Yuanzhuo's chronic ailment is a tough one to heal..."

Shen Zechuan nodded slightly. "This is the reason Yuanzhuo pushed Qiao Tianya back into the game."

After a moment of silence, Xiao Chiye said, "The paths of talented men never run smooth."<sup>19</sup>

The atmosphere was slightly heavy as Shen Zechuan nudged the chess piece under the candlelight and said, "The medicine Yuanzhuo is taking can't cure the illness once and for all at its root. Physicians come and go, but not a single one of them dares to give a definitive answer."

"The poison he was fed with in Dancheng was meant to take his life." Xiao Chiye tossed the chess piece between his fingers into the chess box. "The Venerable Master Yideng became untraceable after the tenth month last year. I asked shifu back in Dajing, and he had no idea either. The Venerable Master made it clear when he left Dajing that he would return after the new year to check on my eldest brother again. But it's already almost the third month, and there's still no sign of him."

Shen Zechuan's health was a constant worry to Xiao Chiye, and seeing Yao Wenyu so frail and weak now, he could not help but feel as if Shen Zechuan would share the same fate. He rose to his feet and pushed aside the chessboard, disregarding the chess pieces bouncing all over the table as he stubbornly stroked Shen Zechuan's cheek.

"By the fourth month at the very latest," Xiao Chiye's gaze spoke volumes as he said in a deep voice with his palm on Shen Zechuan's cheek, "I'll find the Venerable Master, even if I have to dig to the very center of the earth."

Lanterns hung high in the office compound, with the slab stones swept so clean that there was not a single speck of dust on them. This courtyard was newly selected. Several years ago, it was a compound for the officials of the Duanzhou yamen to rest their feet while on duty, and now it had been vacated out for the Imperial Bodyguards to use as an office compound, with several rooms excavated to form a main central hall.

Fei Sheng sat inside with one foot on a stool drinking his wine. Several of his fellow brothers surrounded him and dug into the wine dishes until the plates were a mess. Every one of them was glancing outside.

Huo Lingyun was squatting on the steps with his back to them, eating dry rations with cold water. He was midway through when a cuju ball<sup>20</sup> suddenly came flying over from the side and smashed into his water canteen, which fell to the ground and wetted the corner of his robe. He swallowed the ration in his mouth and turned his head over to look.

The Imperial Bodyguard under the tree grinned at him. "It's dark in the courtyard. I didn't see clearly."

Huo Lingyun reached out an arm to pick up the ball, then rose to his feet and wiped his mouth.

The Imperial Bodyguard teased Huo Lingyun. "At the count of two, throw it back to—"

Before he could finish his words, Huo Lingyun threw the cuju ball out. That leather ball flew over the wall, and in no time, disappeared from sight.

Huo Lingyun rubbed away a handful of snow and answered, "It's dark in the courtyard. I didn't see clearly."

Fei Sheng picked up the food and ate without turning his head around. Meanwhile, the Imperial Bodyguards beside him had all stood up. The one across from him crossed past the branch and went over to bump into Huo Lingyun, scolding in jest, "Son of a bitch, throwing it that far. You going to pick it up?"

One of the lanterns in the courtyard suddenly went out, casting a veil of darkness over this side. Huo Lingyun felt a blow to his abdomen. He rolled up his sleeve and threw out a fist. The steps were slippery, and the few of them tripped him, causing his punch to strike at empty air. The next moment, Huo Lingyun was thrown down to the ground. He protected his head and took a few more blows.

Qiao Tianya strode in from the courtyard entrance and kicked them one after another without even lifting the hem of his robe. His voice was frosty as he berated them, "Get up, all of you!"

"What's going on here?" Fei Sheng shifted his butt and turned his head aside to look down the stairs with a placid expression. "Why are you creating a scene here?”

Huo Lingyun was still protecting his head. He had been kicked until he was covered in shoe prints all over. He spat out a mouthful of blood from the gap between his arms and leaped to his feet.<sup>21</sup>

Qiao Tianya looked at Fei Sheng, who said, “I didn’t hear a thing. Xiaohuo, why didn’t you shout for me?”

It was all ice fragments in Huo Lingyun’s mouth. He spat out several more mouthfuls of them, paying no heed at all to Fei Sheng.

“A few years ago when we received our authority tokens...” Qiao Tianya pulled off the authority token on the waist of the Imperial Bodyguard before him and held it up for everyone in the courtyard to see. He raised his voice. “I bloody said that we have to be of one heart and one mind, to be brothers—take off your tokens now, all of you!”

Not daring to hesitate, the Imperial Bodyguards in the courtyard raised their hands in unison to remove their authority tokens.

The Imperial Bodyguards’ authority token was a symbol of their identity, one they had to hold on to carefully; even loaning it out was out of the question. They once wore the tokens when they basked in those days of glory back in Qudu, and they also wore the tokens when they followed Shen Zechuan in his rise to power in Zhongbo. The authority token itself was an embodiment of their own honor and dignity.

“Go on, throw it.” Qiao Tianya tossed the authority token down at his feet and kicked it away without so much as a look at it. He looked around at everyone. “Or are you keeping it to trample all over it? I said, throw!”

The Imperial Bodyguards tossed their authority tokens on the ground, none of them daring to meet Qiao Tianya right in the eyes. They lowered their heads in dejection and stood at the side like wooden statues.

Fei Sheng’s smile faded. Wiping the corners of his lips, he said, “Isn’t that too much of you? What is there that you can’t sit and talk over instead of having to throw everyone’s dignity to the ground to trample on?”

“Whose dignity are you talking about?” Qiao Tianya asked Fei Sheng. “Everyone’s? Or yours?”

The flames of the fury that Fei Sheng had been forcibly suppressing suddenly leaped up high. He pushed back the chair with a clatter as he stood up and said, “Is my dignity what he’s trampling on today? He’s clearly trampling on me as an individual! What? So it serves me right to be a stepping stone for someone else? You, Qiao Tianya, had it all worked out, didn't you?!"

Qiao Tianya ordered, "Get out."

The Imperial Bodyguards in the courtyard immediately withdrew, leaving only the three of them behind.

Fei Sheng flung the chopsticks in his hand into the wine cup. His unwillingness to take it lying down blazed along with his fury. He kicked over the table with a foot and turned around to point at Huo Lingyun. "Does it feel good to trample on me, hm? You have to snatch the limelight, make a grab for Master's rewards, and even take credit for the venerable old man's military achievements before. You really don't give a shit about anyone, huh?!" Then he pointed at Qiao Tianya and questioned in an icy tone, "Did you already have it all planned out with him?"

"Oh yeah." Qiao Tianya straightened up. "All to plot against you."

The candlelight in the hall shone bright, and it was here Fei Sheng stood, while Huo Lingyun stood outside in the pitch-black darkness. Meanwhile, Qiao Tianya stood on that boundary line between black and white, partially blocking off both parties. A dark crow on a snow-tipped branch of an old tree cawed a few times. Fei Sheng's chest heaved. He took a few sudden steps closer.

"I put my life on the line being on the go with Master, and you screwed me over with this son-of-a-bitch of a newcomer!" Fei Sheng pointed at himself, so overwhelmed with resentment that both his eyes went red. "I was the one who opened the gates of Qudu, defended Wuxian Peak in Dunzhou, and took down Fanzhou with the venerable old man! So why can't I assume this position? On what grounds does it have to be you, Qiao Tianya?! To think I even consider you as my fucking brother!"

Qiao Tianya pressed in a step closer. "You think of me as your brother, and yet you say I plotted against you? I told you a long time ago, don't keep dwelling on this matter. What's meant to be yours will eventually be yours!"

Fei Sheng immediately retorted, "Shouldn't this position be mine?!"

The startled night crow on the snow-tipped branch promptly took off. The remaining lanterns swayed in the courtyard, distorting the shadows on the ground. In this tense, antagonistic atmosphere, Fei Sheng shoved Qiao Tianya aside, descended the stairs in a few steps, and ignored the shouts as he headed right for the exit.

He could not stay here for even a moment more!

Fei Sheng ignored everyone else after stepping out of the courtyard. Having consumed quite a fair bit of wine, he supported himself against the wall as he walked. He slipped a few times and bumped his head, bruising it. All of a sudden, he squatted at the foot of the wall and wiped his eyes in aggrievement as he lashed out at whoever, "Fuck..."

Sobering up a little, Fei Sheng blew his nose. Someone ahead blew his nose too. Startled, Fei Sheng jerked to his feet and saw a head popping out in front.

Yin Chang had his hands folded under his sleeves as he leaned up ahead to wait for him. He smacked his lips a few times and asked, "The heck you crying for?"

Fei Sheng did not move even after having discerned that it was the old man. He merely remained motionless in place and said nothing.

"Come on, let's go." Yin Chang urged as he stomped his freezing feet. "We'll find a place to drink. It's rather cold to be standing around like poles here!"

Fei Sheng did not want to. He could be rather bullheaded when he was being stubborn, and he was still fuming inside.

Yin Chang rubbed his arms. "It's just one tooth that got knocked off, man. Why get into a hissy fit with them over it?"

Fei Sheng tossed away the handkerchief he used to wipe his hands, his expression as capricious as the weather. Eventually, he forced out a smile and said, "What's there for me to get into a fit with them over?"

Yin Chang craned his neck to look at Fei Sheng's expression. The reach of the light from the lanterns ahead did not extend to this spot. Fei Sheng stood with his head lowered and averted his head away in refusal to show the old man.

Yin Chang was so cold he could not stand it. Taking small, brisk steps, he said, "Since that position has already been given to him, then so be it. The way I see it, you're formidable too! Gu Jin is a man of outstanding abilities, and only you in our Zhongbo can compare to him. Qiao Tianya doesn't have the capability to. We still have a future, so why insist on getting in a huff at him here? Mind that His Lordship doesn't see it, or he'll rebuff you for being petty."

Fei Sheng's fury blazed with even more vehemence.

Yin Chang took no notice of him and continued, "You oppress Huo Lingyun to the extent it is so unwarranted and unbecoming of the occasion. How can you convince and win over the others? There are still those from the Dengzhou Garrison Troops in the Imperial Bodyguards! Would they not feel disillusioned? What does a commander-in-chief do? He oversees an entire army. So how can this position be given to you if you can't show a little tolerance?"

Fei Sheng raised his voice. "Only Qiao Tianya can do it. Only Qiao Tianya is capable!"

"When it comes to people, Qiao Tianya does indeed have the capability." Yin Chang sighed and went around to the other side of Fei Sheng. The old man was short, so when he stood near Fei Sheng, he was several heads shorter. "Look at him. He didn't vie with you in Cizhou, yet his prestige remains intact. Has he or has he not advised you not to keep oppressing Huo Lingyun? Alright, don't say a word! I know you're going to say that you didn't oppress Huo Lingyun, but have you ever assigned him to any of the Imperial Bodyguards' tasks? No, right?"

Fei Sheng said, "I'm his mother? I even have to take care of all his needs from eating to drinking and pissing to pooping?!"

Yin Chang leaped up to whack him. "You dope, why don't you get it? You yourself know best what you did!" With that, he shoved Fei Sheng. "Move it, now!"

Fei Sheng staggered under the force of the shove.

Yin Chang kicked his ass and cursed, "I'd totally whip you if you were my son!"

Fei Sheng tugged at his dirty robe. He was so pissed he turned back and yelled, "I have a fucking father!"

"Keep your eyes on the road! If you want this position that badly, I'll go beg His Lordship tomorrow and kowtow to him until you get it back. See if that shames you!" Yin Chang took a few steps and added, "I have a fucking son too!"

This was something new to Fei Sheng. In all the time Yin Chang was in Cizhou, he rarely spoke of his past.

"If my son were still alive, he would be of the same age as you."

After keeping his mouth shut for a while, Fei Sheng suddenly asked, "So how did he die?"

Yin Chang's feet crunched noisily on the snow; he was finally able to get a clear look of the path with aid from the starlight overhead. He shrank his neck and answered, "Starvation."

Fei Sheng held on to the wall, not daring to talk back to the old man again.

When Yin Chang was young, he used to hang around the marketplace. He was a lad of lowly origins, with no trade skills and education. To earn his bread, he went to great efforts to enlist in the army. At that time, the registration of households in the census registers<sup>22</sup> that Qi Huilian implemented had just come to Cizhou, and Yin Chang made it in time to exploit the last loophole to join the garrison troops where he stayed for thirty years. He lived hand to mouth, one day at a time, in the garrison troops. Although he was illiterate, he got himself well-acquainted with the terrains. It was just as he had boasted to Fei Sheng. As long as it was in Zhongbo, he would not go the wrong way even with his eyes closed. Ordinary bandits were no match for him at all.

Yin Chang did not want to bring up his wife and son because they died of starvation during the reign of Xiande. That was the prelude to Yin Chang's problematic drinking. He looked back on his past and felt himself to be like the mud beneath his feet, one who had never amounted to much in this life.

"You have a future serving His Lordship, and you have so much more promise than me." Yin Chang looked at the road under his feet. "Xiaosheng, one has to be down-to-earth in their journey through life; you can't just look upward. You know it better than I do that the wiser and mightier the master is, the harder he is to serve. You can't fool His Lordship, and you can't hide what you're thinking from him. Do you think His Lordship doesn't know about this temperament of yours? Didn't he still go ahead and put you to use by his side? That's because you have talent. You fixed your eyes on Qiao Tianya and Huo Lingyun, but they both don't walk the same path as you. You're an intelligent lad, albeit a silly one. Don't bear a grudge against them over this bit of trivial matter and ruin the bond you have forged with His Lordship and wreck your future prospects."

Fei Sheng felt even more aggrieved at this point. He walked up ahead and wiped his face.

Fei Sheng's father was the common son of a concubine from the Fei Clan. By the time it came to Fei Sheng, he had become so far removed from the legitimate lineage that he could not even benefit from a connection to the Marquis of Helian from his very same clan. What's more, his father was a gambler. Had he not died early, Fei Sheng would probably not have been able to hold on to his position of the Assistant Commander of the Imperial Bodyguards. Fei Sheng had served under many a number of people. In order to make connections with the Marquis of Helian back then, he spent all day bootlicking the Junior Marquis, Fei Shi. Then he followed Han Cheng, who kept bossing him around like he was his son.

He was not a gentleman of virtue. He was not anything. He merely wanted to come out of his ordeals stronger and etch out a name for himself.

The old man said, "You make little of Huo Lingyun, but I heard he is also of decent origins. His father was someone who fought the bandits. It's not easy to survive and stay alive. Don't keep giving him such a hard time."

Fei Sheng said, "He stole your military credits!"

"Then just give it to him." Yin Chang walked behind Fei Sheng and looked up at Fei Sheng's back while the latter was unaware. After a long time, he said, "How many years more do I have to live? It's pointless for me to hold on to it anyway."

Fei Sheng was still young, with a tall stature and a strong, healthy physique.

Without realizing it, Yin Chang stopped. It seemed as if this was only as far as he could go. Even if he refused to concede defeat to old age, he could not catch up with the pace of the younger generation. It was another world ahead of them. For a long time, he watched as Fei Sheng continued walking forward along this road.

"Xiaosheng, this old man is a good-for-nothing who can't even keep his son alive in his lifetime. But believe me, I can tell that you will live to a hundred years and retire with merit to your name! So keep walking." Yin Chang paused for a moment and suddenly shouted, "Onward and forward!"

Fei Sheng looked back at Yin Chang, finding the old man's gaze foreign. In this life of his, he had never been gazed upon this attentively by his father, so he did not understand the hope and expectation that lay behind this gaze. He stopped in his tracks and said, "Keep walking too, you."

Yin Chang inexplicably started to laugh. He smoothed up his messy white hair to reveal his weathered and worn face. "I'm already old."

In the end, the Imperial Bodyguards did not stir up a commotion. Even if Fei Sheng was displeased, he knew his place. The next day, as he handed the medicine to Shen Zechuan, he heard Shen Zechuan ask, “Did you drink?”

Fei Sheng saw that the Prefectural Lord was still approving the cases and was not looking up at him. The latter seemed to be just asking in passing. Feeling unsettled and unable to figure out Shen Zechuan’s intent, Fei Sheng could only answer truthfully, “... I drank a little last night.”

Shen Zechuan handed the cases he had finished approving over to Fei Sheng and said, “Head over to the office compound yourself to forfeit your salary as penalty.”

It was not Fei Sheng’s turn to be on duty yesterday. Unable to make any sense of it, he took the cases and gingerly attempted to explain, “It wasn’t my turn yesterday to...”

“Didn’t I tell you to handle the recruitment?” Shen Zechuan finally raised his eyes to look at Fei Sheng. “This job is not complete so long as the register of names has not yet been submitted.”

Fei Sheng was taken aback, and then delight took over. Grasping the cases, he fell to his knees with a “thud” and said, “Master is wise. I’ll get it done right away!”

With the Imperial Cavalry’s commander-in-chief position given to Qiao Tianya, Fei Sheng thought that his previous assignments would be handed over to Qiao Tianya too. This was an important assignment that involved the vetting and recruitment of soldiers, which carried a lot of weight in the newly established light cavalry. He never expected the task to fall to him still.

Shen Zechuan exercised his neck a little and cast a sidelong glance at the window. It was sunny days on end in Duanzhou now that it was nearing the third month, and the snow in the courtyard had more or less melted. Faint light filtered through the window paper and shone upon his right ear, creating a gorgeous but tiny glow swaying on his neck.

Xiao Chiye was standing in the courtyard at this time, having received new information on Qudu from Gu Jin.

CHAPTER 221: QUANDARY

Xiao Chiye pulled open the bamboo blinds upon entering the room, and Fei Sheng took his leave. Bringing with him a trail of cool breeze from outside, Xiao Chiye placed the opened letter on Shen Zechuan's desk. "In the second trial of the Dancheng case, the Pan clan had an errant servant from their manor take the blame. They intend to extract Pan Lin out first on grounds of Pan Yi's lapse in management."

Shen Zechuan read the letter. "The Pan clan misappropriated the commoners' fields, and it's now a scene of desolation everywhere in Dancheng with nine out of ten houses standing empty. All they need to do is to check Dancheng's census register, and they will know that the displaced commoners left destitute and homeless last year numbered in the thousands. Just handing over an errant servant alone isn't enough to plug in the missing pieces. Pan Lin manages the eight cities' taxes in the Ministry of Revenue. It's impossible for him to be unaware of how much is missing."

"The men in charge of the matters pertaining to the Pan clan's field taxes have already been thrown in prison." Xiao Chiye blocked out some of the light. "All these people insisted they were blinded by their own obsession for money and that they did not do so at the Pan clan's behest."

Shen Zechuan gently rubbed the paper with his fingertips. "Pan Xiangjie, that wily old fox."

Pan Xiangjie had seen firsthand just how formidable Hua Siqian and Wei Huaigu were, so he had long made preparations in order to take precautions against such a day. The men he arranged to be in charge of the Dancheng's field taxes were all sons of his servants<sup>23</sup> who shared a common interest with the Pan clan. Protecting Pan Lin at this juncture was akin to protecting the lives of their whole family, young and old. Naturally, they would be willing to keep their mouths sealed and take the blame.

Xiao Chiye said, "Since Xue Xiuzhuo dares to strike at this moment, he must have a handle that could be held against the Pan clan in his hand."

"He was even able to bring Kong Qiu and Cen Yu on board, so it's not entirely out of the question for him to have Dancheng's real accounts in hand." Shen Zechuan thought for a moment. "But he didn't show his hand."

This case already had the Three Judicial Offices conducting a joint trial. Pan Lin had also been dismissed from his position pending prosecution. Xue Xiuzhuo only had to instruct Liang Cuishan to present the evidence as per procedure, and they would have emerged victorious. Even if only one Pan Lin was taken down in the end, it also had a pivotal effect on the current division of power in Qudu.

"I thought about it, and the only thing that can hold Xue Xiuzhuo back from making a move is the spring plowing." Sunlight filtered out from behind and spilled onto the side of Lanzhou's face. Xiao Chiye raised an arm to block it, refusing to let it peek. "The spring plowing of the Thirteen Cities of Juexi is right around the corner."

"But Juexi didn't suffer from a disaster last year, and the granaries of the thirteen cities are in abundance." As if unaware of Er-lang's possessiveness of him, Shen Zechuan said, "They didn't allocate military provisions to the Five Commanderies of Qidong in winter and merely replenished Qudu's granaries, so they should still have reserves for spring plowing. What is Xue Xiuzhuo afraid of?"

"There's naturally no issue going by the original plan." Xiao Chiye sat at the table's edge and looked at Shen Zechuan. "But what if something went awry in between?"

A hint was all Shen Zechuan needed to make the connection. He set down the brush. "Looks like the Empress Dowager wants to use Qi Zhuyin's mobilization of troops to shift and empty out Juexi's granaries."

The requisition of military provisions was what enabled Qudu to empty out Juexi's granaries at this moment. If Xue Xiuzhuo acted arbitrarily now and insisted on continuing to dig deeper into the matter, then there was no way the spring plowing in Juexi this year could be carried out. The meals of tens of thousands of people were hanging over Xue Xiuzhuo's head, putting him in a situation where he had to beat a retreat even if he did not want to.

"What the Empress Dowager is doing here is getting the better of him by letting him strike first before launching a counterattack." Xiao Chiye said. "If Xue Xiuzhuo agrees to the requisition of military provisions, then the Juexi's granaries will be left vacant. For the sake of the spring plowing, Juexi must borrow the grains from the Eight Cities that still have reserves. In that case, Xue Xiuzhuo can't offend the noble clans now. He has to cease pursuing the matter of the field taxes and make peace with the Empress Dowager, who represents the noble clans. If Xue Xiuzhuo refuses the requisition of military provisions, there will be no one to replenish the military provisions of the Five Commanderies of Qidong, and Qi Zhuyin will not be able to mobilize troops."

Juexi not only had to shoulder the load for Qudu's granaries, but also Qidong's military provisions. If they lacked grains during the spring plowing season, the various prefectural prefects of the various areas would have to report the exact amount of grain shortage in the territories to the Provincial Administration Commission. As the Provincial Administration Commissioner of Juexi, Jiang Qingshan would have to think of ways to make up for these shortages. Under normal circumstances, the Ministry of Revenue would proceed to coordinate based on the harvest situation in the various local areas last year, and Jiang Qingshan would issue memorandums of debt to the Provincial Administration Commissioners of the nearby regions that had bumper harvests last year to borrow grains. When the time came, everyone would make their own negotiations as to whether to exchange those grains with their own territories' agricultural products or with silver. However, at this time, only the Eight Cities could loan out grains to Juexi. To convince the Empress Dowager to loan them grains after Juexi's granaries were emptied for the requisition of military provisions, Xue Xiuzhuo had to drop his investigation into the field taxes of the Eight Cities, and even Dancheng's.

"Even if he has the money, he won't be able to buy grains. The whole thing about the field taxes has already alerted the perpetrators. If he missed his opportunity now, it would be even harder to investigate it in the future. Besides, this case has drawn the attention of the Imperial College. If Xue Xiuzhuo were to beat a retreat, the students would denounce him in writing." Shen Zechuan slowly leaned on the table. "This trap the Empress Dowager laid out is brilliant. She merely seized the opportunity to move around the chess pieces, and she managed to put Xue Xiuzhuo on the horns of a dilemma.”

The Empress Dowager also drew from Shen Zechuan’s influence here. The military provisions Shen Zechuan supplemented Qidong with were all “stolen” grains Yan Heru consolidated from the Hezhou and Juexi’s granaries. With the requisition from Qudu, Juexi was no different from having undergone two rounds of military grain replenishment in just half a year. Of course its granaries would not be able to bear the burden.

Xiao Chiye covered the top of Shen Zechuan’s head and said, “And so, Xue Yanqing, ever so meticulous and thorough in his strategies, found himself trapped in a deadlock.”

“There is still a way out.” Shen Zechuan raised his eyes and said guilelessly to Xiao Chiye, “If I were in his shoes, I’d simply just take the Empress Dowager out of the game.”

With the snow in Qudu melting fast in the past few days, water started trickling off the eaves along the streets. Fortunately, the public ditches had been newly repaired last year, so a repeat of the clogage incident did not occur. The location of the Xue residence was not remote, but it was too close to the abode next to it, and the foot of the walls of both homes ended up so waterlogged they collapsed.

Xue Xiuzhuo had been staying over in the Court of Judicial Review of late. When he returned home to get a change of clothes, he saw that the courtyard wall had already been rebuilt anew, so he asked the steward-in-charge serving in residence, “When was it repaired?”

Xue Xiuzhuo did not bother with the unnecessary formalities in the management of his household. The steward, already getting up in the years, was still respectful and deferential as he followed at Xue Xiuzhuo’s side. He answered truthfully. “The eldest madam came back a few days ago to visit Jin-ge’er. Seeing that the courtyard wall had collapsed, she brought up the matter to the eldest master on her return, and he called for someone to come over and repair it.”

Upon hearing those words, Xue Xiuzhuo’s eyes darkened slightly. He pondered it over for a moment, finding his eldest brother Xue Xiuyi’s actions unusual. Xue Xiuyi did not get along with Xue Xiuzhuo. He had squandered away his remaining family fortune after dividing up family property to live apart. Benefiting from his relationship with Xue Xiuzhuo, he held a sinecure position in the Ministry of Revenue, where he could barely make ends meet, so where in the world did he get this disposable money to help Xue Xiuzhuo repair the courtyard wall?

“Get the accountant to reimburse him accordingly,” Xue Xiuzhuo said, “and ensure that the eldest madam doesn’t visit Jin-ge’er again for no reason.”

Jin’ge-er was Xue the Eldest’s lawful son. He was eight years old this year. Xue Xiuzhuo kept him by his side to raise him, and even when Xue the Eldest divided up the family property and left to live apart, Xue Xiuzhuo did not return Jin’ge-er to Xue the Eldest and his wife. Xue the Eldest came to ask for him back several times, but as he always failed to see Xue Xiuzhuo, he could only give up.

The steward acknowledged his order with an “understood”.

Xue Xiuzhuo’s bundle<sup>24</sup> was light. He never wore silk and satin, and his most ornate clothing was his official robe, so it was quite convenient for him to pack them up. He often stayed over in the office compound, with only a mute lad following by his side to prepare the ink for him. He had no maidservants and usually ate plain, simple fares. These were all habits he had retained from working hands-on at the local levels as Chief Supervising Secretary of the Ministry of Revenue.

Xue Xiuzhuo had to return to the office compound once he was done packing. The steward held up the umbrella for him and gently advised him, “Third Master always stays over at the compound without anyone to serve you. This weather is given to such sudden changes that you still need to put on thick clothes.”

When Xue Xiuzhuo reached the entrance, the mute lad stepped forth to take over the umbrella and spoke to him, making “uh, uh” sounds. Xue Xiuzhuo nodded to indicate his acknowledgement and turned back to the steward. “I’ll leave all household affairs in your hand. My monthly salary will be sent back on time. See if there’s anything we can acquire for the residence, and you can just go ahead and buy it.”

Ever since Xue Xiuzhuo was promoted, he never took the sedan again; instead, he walked to and fro on foot. Now that he was done giving his instruction, he turned around to walk into the drizzle, with the mute lad holding up the umbrella. When he arrived at the office compound, he saw Liang Cuishan, who had already been waiting for a while.

“Your Excellency Yanqing.” Liang Cuishan descended the steps to meet and pay his obeisances to Xue Xiuzhuo.

Xue Xiuzhuo dismissed the mute lad and said to Liang Cuishan, “We’ll talk inside.”

Liang Cuishan slowed down a few steps and followed Xue Xiuzhuo into the house. It was lit inside, but the charcoal brazier was empty. Liang Cuishan found the chair cold when he took his seat. While waiting earlier, he had taken a look at this house. It was simple and unpretentious, and the only thing of worth here was the deceased Old Master Yao’s writings hanging on the wall. Other than that, the table, chairs, and benches were all standard furniture.

Who would have expected Xue Xiuzhuo to be capable of shouldering the Qidong’s military salaries?

“Chongshen, no need to hold back.” Xue Xiuzhuo opened a window and sat down. He spoke in a mild tone, “You’re here today regarding the Dancheng field tax case, right?”

Xue Xiuzhuo’s stature was tall, and his demeanor, poised; being around him made one feel as if they were standing amidst the spring breeze. He was now a significant official in Qudu, but Liang Cuishan felt very comfortable in his presence. He not only lacked the haughtiness of a noble family’s descendant, but also did not have the reservations of an official of humble origins. What’s more, he had the tendency to impress upon the others a favorable impression when he spoke frankly and in measured tones.

“That’s right.” Liang Cuishan took out a securely wrapped account book in his arms. “This humble subordinate is here precisely because of the Dancheng’s field taxes case.”

Xue Xiuzhuo waited for his next words.

Liang Cuishan continued, “The Empress Dowager issued a decree last time for Third Missy Hua to return for a visit. Commander-in-chief Qi will have to accompany her in her father’s stead. In my humble opinion, she meant to hurry His Excellency.”

No doubt the Empress Dowager called for Qi Zhuyin to enter the capital at this time to put pressure on Xue Xiuzhuo. The requisition of military provisions was still stuck in limbo, and time waited for no man.

Xue Xiuzhuo said, “The Grand Secretariat has already drawn up the writ to allow Commander-in-chief Qi to mobilize troops against the Qingshu tribe, but the Empress Dowager kept putting off the approval. It is not entirely a bad thing for Commander-in-chief Qi to enter the capital at this time.”

Liang Cuishan replied, “But the requisition of military provisions is still up in the air. If this drags on, I fear it will delay Juexi’s spring plowing.”

The dilemma here was the reason Xue Xiuzhuo had not rested for days. He and Jiang Qingshan went to great lengths to straighten out the account books of the thirteen cities of Juexi so as to prevent Juexi from falling into the displacement problem that was plaguing the eight cities. The Empress Dowager held his Achilles heel in her hands; this was not a move he could afford to make rashly.

Even if Liang Cuishan did not come to see Xue Xiuzhuo today, Xue Xiuzhuo would still have to go and meet him. He said, “Chongshen, you are in charge of all affairs pertaining to salt taxes in Hezhou and Juexi. Why don’t you tell me the details of Hezhou?”

This implied an intention to borrow grains from Hezhou.

Liang Cuishan looked hesitant. “This humble subordinate shall be direct. It will prove difficult for Your Excellency to borrow grains from Hezhou. While it’s true that Hezhou had a bumper harvest this year, the public grains are being supplied to Qudu, and the remaining grains will also have to be kept in reserve for the spring plowing. We can only borrow from the Yan clan. That Yan Heru is a tough nut to crack, and he’s also overbearing because of his wealth. He may not necessarily be willing to loan the grains even if we give him money. My fear is that he will take the opportunity to demand something else and end up being the fly in the ointment that ruins the entire game in Hezhou.”

Xue Xiuzhuo contemplated it over.

His struggle right now was over grains and not money, and the crux was that he could not purchase grain even if he had the money. Had it been Qidong’s military salaries he was fretting over at present, he could still raise the tariffs in Hezhou and Juexi and fleece the merchants for this sum of money. But it just had to be grains they were lacking.

Hai Liangyi’s plans had been to transfer Jiang Qingshan over to restore Zhongbo. By doing so, they would be able to round up some grains this year and put together more from Huaizhou when the time came. Resolving their predicament over the military provisions was not hard. However, Zhongbo was now Shen Zechuan’s territory, and the commercial route between Cizhou, Huaizhou, and Chazhou had cut off a relatively large portion of Qudu's grain supply.

"When Commander-in-chief Qi enters the capital," Xue Xiuzhuo said, "I'll discuss it with her."

Author's Note:

I see a few of you can't distinguish between Xue Xiuzhuo and Xue Xiuyi, so I'll be using Xue the Eldest (pinyin: Xueda) from now on.

Thank you for reading.

CHAPTER 222: BLUFF OF A MOVE

Horse hooves stirred up the mud and came to a stop at the entrance of the city gates.

With a cloak hung over her arm, Qi Zhuyin looked at the towering city walls of Qudu with her back to the overcast sky. Day had yet to break at this time, and the young general of the Eight Great Training Divisions stationed at the top of the city wall instantly drew out his voice in a shout, “OPEN—THE GATE. Our respectful welcome to Commander-in-chief Qi!”

A few city soldiers shouted in unison as they pulled the gate open. The mechanism issued a muffled noise, and the mottled city gate slowly rose. The Eight Great Training Divisions soldiers in the city stood solemnly on both sides, their faces to Qi Zhuyin at the entrance as they held down their swords in greeting.

Qi Zhuyin raised an arm, and the Qidong cavalymen behind her stepped back in unison, leaving a considerable distance between them. She shook the reins and led Hua Xiangyi’s horse carriage onto the public road of Qudu.

The soldiers on both sides stood with solemn respect, their eyes never once wandering.

Qi Zhuyin was wearing court attire today. Although she was not conferred a noble rank and title, the Empress Dowager’s personal appointment of her gave her the right to wear the court attire of a marquis. The court attire had a scarlet base, with a baize<sup>25</sup> representing the transcension of ranks embroidered on the mandarin square.<sup>26</sup> She had also swapped out the liangguan headgear<sup>27</sup> that went with the male attire into a wuzhu ornament<sup>28</sup> that swung in the air along with the horse's movements.

Court officials who were there to welcome them waited right ahead of the public road, while the Imperial Bodyguards' Commander-in-chief, Han Cheng, and palace eunuch, Fuman, stood at the side.

Both sides exchanged pleasantries before they had to lead Qi Zhuyin into the palace.

The streets had been cleared out, and no one made a ruckus. Qudu was so silent that all that could be heard was the melodious chirps of a lone sparrow. Han Cheng mounted his horse and followed at Qi Zhuyin's side. With a smile, he said, "Commander-in-chief Qi has performed a valuable service now that the Bianjun Commandery has scored a victory. There's bound to be tremendous rewards on your entry into the capital this time."

Although these words were spoken genially, they hit Qi Zhuyin's sore point. She had never been conferred a title despite having rendered meritorious service several times. Now that Libei had revolted, Qi Zhuyin and the Qidong's Garrison Troops' standing rose, and they became the Empress Dowager's support on the outside. Qi Zhuyin seized the opportunity to remove the eunuch serving as Army-inspecting Censor and subsequently became the thorn in the southeast that could threaten Qudu into making concessions; she had long incurred the displeasure of the Empress Dowager. Then, there was the war with Biansha. The noble rank and title was the Empress Dowager's chain to hold Qi Zhuyin in check, so there was no hope of conferment in the foreseeable future.

Qi Zhuyin did not get along with Han Cheng, and their previous encounters had all been unpleasant. Feigning cordiality with Han Cheng now, she said, "I hope it is as you say."

Both of them socialized on horseback. When they arrived at the palace gates, Fuman, who had been following them the entire way from behind, hurriedly rolled off his horse and personally came over to take over Qi Zhuyin's reins. The Eastern Depot fell into decline after the death of Emperor Tianchen, and the twenty-four yamen no longer had a eunuch of significance like Pan Rugui who had the world at his command. Thus, Fuman behaved himself and kept a low profile.

Qi Zhuyin did not have a good opinion of the palace eunuchs. Shuangxi, whom the imperial court had assigned to them as Army-Inspecting Censor, was still locked up in a cell in the Cangjun Commandery. In order not to incur Qi Zhuyin's ill will, Fuman had gone to the special effort of dressing up. Only daring to go for simplicity, he wore a gourd-patterned mandarin square, a coral duozhen<sup>29</sup> on his head with a cover on the outside, and a pair of black boots on his feet.

Fuman bent at the waist to take the reins from Qi Zhuyin and was all smiles as he said, "This is our Dazhou's 'warhorse'.<sup>30</sup> This humble slave gives his assurance that he will feed it well on behalf of Commander-in-chief Qi."

Qi Zhuyin nodded and cast a look back at the horse carriage. She stood in front and waited for Hua Xiangyi.

Han Cheng tossed his reins to the eunuch at the side and snorted when he heard Fuman. Pointing at Fuman, he said with a laugh, "You sneaky old crook, kissing up to Commander-in-chief Qi seeing how she's about to be rewarded."

Understanding Han Cheng's character, Fuman immediately said, "Commander Han, you're making this humble slave ashamed!" He lowered himself and drew closer to toady up to Han Cheng. "This humble slave usually depends on Commander Han. Say, when will you be able to fulfill this humble slave's wish?"

"You're the same age as me, and you call me grandpa," Han Cheng said. "Even I'd feel so embarrassed if this were to get out."

Fuck you!

Fuman dissed him inwardly. This motherfucker kept putting on air all day, saying he'd feel embarrassed, but doesn't he still treat others like wrenched bastards when bossing them around? But heaven has eyes and made him sonless; there's divine justice after all. How very gratifying!

Fuman soothed his chest and said with a merry laugh, "When the Lao-zuzong<sup>31</sup> was still around, this humble slave was the 'son'. So won't I need to address you as 'grandpa' going by seniority?"

Han Cheng despised these buffoons who served as eunuchs, but he was more than happy to boss them around like dogs. After the reign of Yongyi, the eunuchs were all zuzong. Back then, when Pan Rugui led the Eastern Depot to oppress the Imperial Bodyguards, Han Cheng was not yet its commander, and it had filled him with envy to see Ji Lei acknowledge Pan Rugui as his 'father'. Now that the tables had turned, he was naturally gratified to watch Fuman bowing and groveling before him.

Having attended the Eunuch School, Fuman was literate. During Emperor Tianchen's time, he joined forces with Xiao Chiye to work from both within and without and managed to get into the Directorate of Ceremonial. Later on, when Emperor Tianchen was assassinated by Mu Ru, he instantly switched sides. Under Han Cheng's orders, he summoned Xiao Chiye into the palace with an imperial edict, and consequently, Han Cheng framed Xiao Chiye for regicide. With this credit under his belt, Han Cheng was willing to continue letting him manage the important affairs of the inner palace. Fengquan had stepped down from the stage now anyway. Fuman just had to rack up some experience and build up his record of service, and he could be a "lao-zuzong" too.

Seeing that Hua Xiangyi had yet to get off her carriage, Han Cheng asked Fuman as if in passing, "How has the Heir Apparent been lately?"

Han Cheng made a bad move in the imperial prison back then and failed to kill Li Jianting. As a result, his own attempt to support a Han clan's descendant ascend to the throne failed to come to fruition, and he made an enemy out of Xue Xiuzhuo. Thus, he specifically arranged for Fuman to keep an eye on every single move the Heir Apparent made in the palace.

Turning his body sideways as a cover, Fuman answered in a hushed tone. "It's all as usual."

"Xue Yanqing's recent investigation of the Dancheng's field taxes has thrown the imperial court into chaos." Han Cheng looked at Fuman. "The Empress Dowager has been grieving over it day and night, and she's now in ill health. See if you can drop a hint to the Heir Apparent to get Xue Yanqing to cool it down a notch."

Fuman was momentarily taken aback before he lowered his head in acknowledgment.

The key point in this sentence was to make Xue Xiuzhuo "cool it down a notch". As for how, that was for Fuman to figure out.

Li Jianting was no longer young, yet the Empress Dowager still showed no intent to return power to the Heir Apparent. She sat in place of the Son of Heaven, acting on his behalf and banishing Li Jianting outside the imperial court. Li Jianting's right to sit in on the proceedings was all at the suggestion of the officials participating in the classics colloquium.<sup>32</sup> And now Xue Xiuzhuo was pushing them into such a corner in the outer court. The Empress Dowager meant to teach Xue Xiuzhuo a lesson.

Fuman's heart pounded, but he dared not let his expression betray his emotion and remained bowing until Han Cheng left.

Water dripped off the eaves, turning the windowsills damp again, while the old books on the table started to crease. Yao Wenyu drew up his wide sleeves and flipped the pages open to dry.

In the third month, when the ice and snow melted, Duanzhou suddenly turned warm, and everywhere was damp all around. Shen Zechuan stood beside the table and casually looked at those old books of Yao Wenyu.

"Xue Yanqing has to have a detailed discussion with Commander-in-chief Qi regarding the requisition of the military provisions." Yao Wenyu smoothed the creased corners with the pulps of his fingers. "Only the Bianjun Commandery of Qidong fought a war last year, and the military provisions at that time were supplied by Qudu. The remaining four commanderies' garrison troops that also worked on the fields<sup>33</sup> suffered no loss either. Xue Yanqing keeps a book of accounts in his mind; he will not fall for the Empress Dowager's trap easily."

"It's easy to stump him." Shen Zechuan did not raise his eyes, looking as if he was pondering over the content in the book. "The specifics of Qidong's harvest have yet to be reported. If Commander-in-chief Qi insists that it's insufficient for their use, he won't be able to force it either."

The longer Yao Wenyu stayed by Shen Zechuan's side, the easier he found it to distinguish between the Prefectural Lord's moods. Like how Shen Zechuan was clearly jesting now. This kind of shameless denial could not fool Xue Xiuzhuo, who was proficient in the art of auditing accounts.

Yao Wenyu was in no hurry. Instead, he asked, "In Your Lordship's opinion, what bargaining chip should Xue Yanqing use in his discussion with Commander-in-chief Qi?"

"Naturally, his biggest trump card." Shen Zechuan said without hesitation. "He has the Heir Apparent in his hand, so on certain occasions, he has more of a leg to stand on than the Empress Dowager. Qudu is a stickler for ethics and virtues. Even if the Empress Dowager is effective in her administration of the state, she's merely a stand-in for the Son of Heaven and is not the real Son of Heaven."

The Empress Dowager was dependent on Qidong, but she married Hua Xiangyi over, then suppressed Qi Zhuyin by refusing to promote her. At the same time, to ingratiate herself with Qi Zhuyin, she treated Qi Zhuyin with magnanimity to the extent that she could. Qi Zhuyin turned a blind eye to Qudu's deployment order during Shuangxi's and Lu Pingyan's incidents last year, and the Empress Dowager tolerated it all the same without calling her to task. This was to maintain the status quo of both parties. She kept Qidong pinned down under her own control at all times, so that Qi Zhuyin would remain at her own disposal and, at the same time, unable to fall out with her since she would be handicapped by her lack of a noble rank.

But Li Jianting did not have this misgiving. She was Dazhou's rightful Heir Apparent, with the Grand Secretariat guiding her on the inside and her prestige as a student to bolster her on the outside. She also had the full support of the practical doers faction helmed by Xue Xiuzhuo. It was perfectly justified for Qi Zhuyin to pledge loyalty to her. As long as Li Jianting could hold up against the censors' impeachments, conferring a title upon Qi Zhuyin was just a matter of words. And this happened to be something the Empress Dowager could not do given the awkward position she was in.

Shen Zechuan closed the page. "Qidong's military power remains unstable for each day Commander-in-chief Qi in-chief isn't conferred. Being without a noble rank and title is the root source of Qi Zhuyin's inability to become 'legitimate'. Imagine if she were to die on the battlefield or resign due to injuries suffered. Her brothers of common birth in the family would be able to grab the opportunity to seize Qi Shiyu's title. The Commander-in-chief of the Five Commanderies' armies sounds impressive, but without a noble rank, she's merely a temporary guest in that position who could not inherit everything Qi Shiyu had. The Empress Dowager fears that Qidong would become a second Libei, so she dare not bestow a noble rank upon her, and this 'dare not' is the Empress Dowager's greatest weakness."

What did Li Jianting lack the most now?

Military power.

The noble clans lost Wei Huaigu, and then they found themselves at a disadvantage with Hai Liangyi's remonstrance to his death. The Empress Dowager could still stand on an equal footing with the Grand Secretariat and Xue Xiuzhuo in this game because she held Dazhou's remaining two major military powers firmly in her grasp. Whether it was Kong Qiu or Xue Xiuzhuo, they were all civil officials who only had the authority to engage in military discussions but not deploy troops.

If Xue Xiuzhuo gave Qi Zhuyin the promise to confer the rank and title of a marquis on her at this moment, then Qi Zhuyin could give up going around in circles with the Empress Dowager and switch camp to the Heir Apparent. The Qidong military forces would then naturally pledge allegiance to Li Jianting, and this would be akin to hacking off an arm of the Empress Dowager.

“Money makes the mare go.” Yao Wenyu took the book Shen Zechuan returned to him. “If Xue Yanqing didn’t have the Xi clan’s money vaults, then he would not be able to convince Commander-in-chief Qi with just a verbal promise. But now that he is bearing the expenses for Qidong’s military salaries, Commander-in-chief Qi would have to deliberate over it carefully.”

The above hypotheses were based on the premise that the Qidong’s garrison troops who also worked the fields were truly able to be self-sufficient and did not need to forcibly requisition grains from the Juexi’s granaries. However, Qidong’s military provisions this year were, in fact, in Shen Zechuan’s hands. Qi Zhuyin had to take Zhongbo into account, and she had to weigh it over carefully. If Shen Zechuan were to be displeased with her decision to switch sides to the Heir Apparent, then the Yan clan could sever the supply of Qidong’s military provisions, and Qi Zhuyin would still need to ask Qudu for grains. Xue Xiuzhuo would be back to square one, where he would have to face his initial dilemma all over again.

“Xue Xiuzhuo. Hua Hewei.” Shen Zechuan smiled as he tossed Yao Wenyu’s spent brush into the brush holder. “Who should I play with?”

Shen Zechuan’s wrist bone bathed under the sunlight. He held in his hand an invisible thread, one that could steer the situation in Qudu without so much as a sound.

Yao Wenyu straightened the brush and said with certainty, “Your Lordship already has a plan.”

Day had yet to break. Palace maids stood waiting in attendance under the palace eaves, keeping out of the way while silently carrying lanterns in hands to illuminate the path. Qi Zhuyin entered the palace for her audience with the empress dowager. She had to head for Mingli Hall, while Hua Xiangyi had to wait in the Empress Dowager’s bedchamber, so both of them could only walk together for a brief distance.

As Hua Xiangyi could not stand the cold, she wore a wotu fur hat<sup>34</sup> on her forehead as well. She had such excellent deportment that not even the tinkling of her jade ring pendant could be heard when she walked, and when she stood beside Qi Zhuyin, she was only a little shorter.

Qi Zhuyin had been spending all day in the Bianjun Commandery back in Qidong, and to date, she had barely spoken more than a few words to Hua Xiangyi. Finding it a little stifling, she was just about to speak when Hua Xiangyi asked,

“Has Commander-in-chief Qi taken a look at the household accounts?”

It was then Qi Zhuyin remembered. “I looked through it when I returned home the last time. Thank you...” She stuck on the word “mother” for a long time, truly unable to voice it out as she looked at Hua Xiangyi’s face that was two years younger than her. All she could do was to hastily skip it over and continue, “... for going to the trouble.”

Hua Xiangyi covered the hand warmer<sup>35</sup> and watched the crow flit across the dark, gloomy sky. In the blink of an eye, it disappeared among the palace eaves. This was a sight familiar to her. She responded, “You’re welcome, Commander-in-chief.”

Qi Zhuyin glanced out of the corner of her eye at the stalk of a small sunflower embroidered on Hua Xiangyi’s collar. It was like a kind of delicate charm hiding under a dignified veneer, and it was completely out of place in the deep, silent inner palace. For that reason, it appeared particularly exquisite and lovable.

All of a sudden, Hua Xiangyi turned her head and looked at Qi Zhuyin for just a brief moment before she averted her gaze. Softly, she said, “The reasons my aunt summoned Commander-in-chief Qi is, firstly, for the mobilization of troops against the Qingshu Tribe and, secondly, for the requisition of military provisions. Both of these matters can be consolidated into one. Commander-in-chief Qi needs to make a decision.”

Qi Zhuyin could not figure out Hua Xiangyi’s intent in telling her these right now. Her entry into the capital this time was being used by the Empress Dowager as a weapon to coerce Xue Xiuzhuo and the Grand Secretariat. Qi Zhuyin had long heard about the issues with Dancheng’s field taxes.

But Hua Xiangyi changed the topic and said, “Qudu is a stormfest all year around. Even if one were to stand at the top of the building, one still can’t get a clear look at the splendor before its stairs. What’s more, the weather is so cold. Many a number of stores on Shenwu Street have closed, and those who drink themselves drunk at night are those with empty stomachs.”

Slightly stunned, Qi Zhuyin looked at Hua Xiangyi, who had already stopped in her tracks. The latter turned sideways to the silent Fuman behind them and said with a smile, “Like neutered tomcats.”

Fuman’s mind was in a whirl himself. He vaguely heard the word “cold weather” and so he wasn’t really registering what was being said. He saw Hua Xiangyi standing all daintily ahead of him and felt Third Missy Hua to be a beauty too peerless to be gazed at up close, so he lifted the lantern and said with an apologetic smile. “This humble slave was afraid of putting a damper on Your Ladyship and Commander-in-chief Qi’s mood and so did not dare to make a din.”

“Since we’re already here,” Hua Xiangyi said to Qi Zhuyin softly, “Commander-in-chief Qi may go on ahead.”

Thin frost hung over the newly planted flowers and plants at the side of the stairs to Mingli Hall. The front of the hall was wide and spacious, with the floor so polished they gleamed. The inside of the waiting hall announced her name, and a eunuch led Qi Zhuyin up the stairs. She felt the chill under her feet stepping up those stairs. This was a sensation she could not get used to no matter how many times she had gone through it.

The curtain in the hall opened to both sides, and Qi Zhuyin strode in.

The various court officials waiting inside rose to their feet. Qi Zhuyin looked at no one as she paid her obeisances to the Empress Dowager. Without letting down the beaded curtains, the Empress Dowager said with a smile, “I have not seen Zhuyin for only two months, and already I miss her. It’s bitterly cold over in the Bianjun Commandery. Rise, and let me have a closer look.”

Qi Zhuyin raised her head. In the periphery of her vision, she saw the Heir Apparent standing at the side.

The Minister of War, Chen Zhen, stood with his sleeves brought together and looked at Qi Zhuyin with somewhat worried eyes. Cen Yu did not look too good. Only Kong Qiu could be considered to be his usual self. The atmosphere in this hall was odd, just like those newly planted flowers outside which looked to be joined at the stems but were, in fact, merely a show on the surface, for its roots had long been damaged by the freezing cold.

The Empress Dowager was confident of victory and was in no hurry to cut to the chase. After exchanging pleasantries with Qi Zhuyin for a while, she said, "You are stationed at the frontier all year round, rain or shine. I heard you even refuse a maidservant. Even the most robust of health can't withstand such torment without someone to attend to your needs." Without waiting for Qi Zhuyin to answer, she said to the Marquis of Helian with a sideways glance, "Just look at her."

The Marquis of Helian met the Empress Dowager's eyes and lamented, "Seeing Commander-in-chief Qi reminds this humble subject of that good-for-nothing son of mine, Fei Shi. He may be born a man, but he has no ambitions to speak of. This truly worries me."

"Fei Shi has only just come of age. There has to be someone at his side to supervise and guide him, or even a good-natured child will go wayward." The Empress Dowager looked at Qi Zhuyin again. "Zhuyin, do you still remember your Fei-didi?"

Qi Zhuyin answered, "Vaguely. He's Zhaoyue's younger brother."

She seemed to be used to being forthright as she answered offhandedly. But even the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue had to address her as jiejie. By doing this, she was pulling apart the gap in seniority between her and Fei Shi.

But the Empress Dowager said, "Fei Shi is young, and the lack of people to teach him is worrisome. You are the commander-in-chief of the Qidong military forces, and he admires you very much. He keeps talking about Qi-jiejie all day long and is only dying to run over to Qidong. You are on good terms with Zhaoyue, and both of your families aren't strangers to one another. If you have the time these days, share with him anecdotes from the frontiers to satisfy that fascination of his."

Fei Shi was already of age, so what was there that he couldn't do and needed her, Qi Zhuyin, to teach him? Furthermore, Fei Shi was just a junior marquis who still had yet to inherit the Marquis of Helian's noble rank and title, and he had no official post either. He was so way down at the bottom of the rung compared to Qi Zhuyin that calling her jiejie was simply messing around.

The Empress Dowager's intent was clear. She intended to appoint Fei Shi in marriage to Qi Zhuyin in order to hold her down. For the sake of the military salaries, Qi Zhuyin could not fall out with the Empress Dowager either. She said, "Given that it's Your Majesty's instruction, I ought not to decline, but I did indeed enter the capital this time for military affairs. The issues at the frontier are of utmost urgency. It's inadvisable to delay any further."

The Empress Dowager sat back slightly and did not put her further into a spot. Instead, she rolled with it and said, "Of course. The military report last month gave an account of the Qingshu Tribe's invasion. You won the battle. You deserve a reward."

Qi Zhuyin had a clear handle on the filthy side of Qudu. By stuffing Fei Shi to her at this juncture, the Empress Dowager meant to remind her to behave at the same time she dealt a blow to Xue Xiuzhuo. The issue of the military provisions was a knotty issue—that is, if she did not have Shen Zechuan's supply.

Qi Zhuyin abruptly recalled those words Hua Xiangyi had spoken earlier.

Qudu is a stormfest.

What was Hua Xiangyi hinting at her?

"I've already taken a look at the memorial you submitted to the Ministry of War. It is not wrong to press home the attack and strike while the iron is hot, but it's not the right time now." Unable to get Qi Zhuyin to compromise, the Empress Dowager continued, "The third month happens to coincide with the spring plowing. If Qidong wishes to go to war, the fields the military garrisons work on will have to be left idle, and that means the supply of grains is bound to see a reduction after autumn. The shortfall will have to be obtained from other granaries, but it's no longer possible to make up for it as the common folks of Juexi have to eat too. The imperial court has its own difficulties. Bellicose militarism is never a wise policy; the ones to suffer will still be the common people."

The Empress Dowager did not mention the granaries of the eight cities, which meant that she was leaving it to Qi Zhuyin to bring it up on her own. Qi Zhuyin only had to broach the subject, and the problem could be kicked over into Xue Xiuzhuo's court. Everyone would be caught in a deadlock when the time came, which meant that they still had to heed the Empress Dowager's arrangements. If Xue Xiuzhuo did not drop the case and Qi Zhuyin would not marry, then Qidong would neither be able to deploy its troops nor receive grains.

The sudden silence in the hall was so deafening one could hear a pin drop. No one on either side made a sound, while Qi Zhuyin ruminated over Hua Xiangyi's words from where she was in the middle.

"The Ministry of Revenue reported on the harvest status in each region at the beginning of the year." Li Jianting, who had never interjected before in Mingli hall, suddenly spoke up out of the blue. "If Juexi is unable to bear the burden, we can consolidate with the granaries of the other prefectures to make up for the shortfall."

The Empress Dowager rebutted, "The Heir Apparent doesn't manage court affairs and so does not know the ins and outs of the matter. Hezhou already had its turn last year, and they still have to supply grains to Qudu with Juexi this year. The various regions are all in a difficult position."

In their exchange, they serendipitously avoided bringing up the eight cities. Qi Zhuyin had a sudden flash of insight.

The eight cities surrounded Qudu; were they not Qudu's 'splendor before the stairs'? Hua Xiangyi spoke of not getting a clear look—what was it that one could not get a clear look at? The detailed data of the eight cities' harvests! Since the Dancheng field taxes could be falsified, then how many of the remaining cities' field taxes were even genuine? The fields were not even thoroughly surveyed, and there were plenty that could be concealed within. Hua Xiangyi's final words mentioned those with empty stomachs. There were countless refugees from Dancheng last year, all of whom had fled with their stomachs empty. Pan Yi clearly knew he would not be able to hide this fact, so why did he not set up booths immediately to hand out porridge to the poor?

Sweat was already trickling down Qi Zhuyin's temples in just those few brief moments, and she inwardly exclaimed, what a close call!

The rattan chair rocked slightly, with folds of meandering snow-white sleeves lying on the knees in it. Shen Zechuan opened his folding fan to block out some of the sunlight. Yao Wenyu was still tidying up some old books on the table. It was all quiet in the courtyard.

Shen Zechuan looked at the mottled plum blossoms leaves above his head in tandem with the rocking. The dappled light fell upon him, and he reached out with his folding fan to catch it and hold it before his eyes to scrutinize it.

Yao Wenyu flipped to a stack of cases amidst the old books. He opened it and saw that it was Chazhou's earliest grain records. He had seen this previously, but by some curious coincidence this time, he flipped to the back page, then turned his wheelchair around to speak to Shen Zechuan, who was by the door. "The exorbitantly priced grains of Chazhou for the past years have been grains from Hezhou, but last year, Hezhou even had to bear the burden for both the military provisions and Qudu's granaries. As I see it, the goods being transported and traded in this account book are all large shipments. Suppose Yan Heru still has to shoulder the grains for the bandits of Mount Luo, then even if Hezhou enjoys a bountiful harvest every year..." He slowly straightened out the account book. "... it should be just about empty by now."

"I initially suspected that Yan Heru stole the grains from Juexi and Hezhou to sell. But when Fanzhou's account was released, I realized that the granaries of these two places had no surplus grains left for him to trade."

"Liang Cuishan started to take charge of all affairs pertaining to taxes in Juexi and Hezhou last year. Yan Heru said the last time that he did not manage to get through to Liang Cuishan." Holding on to the door frame for support, Yao Wenyu's expression shifted slightly. "Then where did the grains he sold last year come from?"

Shen Zechuan turned his head and locked eyes with Yao Wenyu for a moment.

"The granaries of the eight cities. The grains Yan Heru resold last year to the various prefectures in Zhongbo came from the eight cities." Yao Wenyu swiftly flipped through the book in his lap. "The exorbitantly priced grains in Fanzhou and Dengzhou were sold through Cai Yu's hands. Your Lordship killed Cai Yu, and Yan Heru did not tell the truth."

The folding fan in Shen Zechuan's palm suddenly closed. He was still leaning back, gazing at the sunlight. Enlightened in that instant, he said, "That means the Empress Dowager did not have enough in reserves to shoulder Qidong's military provisions. She was making empty promises."

This bluff of a move completely had Xue Xiuzhuo trapped. The eight cities' accounts were too corrupted. Even Pan Lin himself would not necessarily know which were genuine and which were forged. The Dancheng fields that Xue Xiuzhuo investigated were indeed off, and the harvest data that Pan Yi had handed over to the Ministry of Revenue at the earliest was fake too. However, the grain surplus that the noble clans had submitted was real. They misappropriated the commoners' fields, and yet they did not have grains, because the grains had been rerouted over on the sly to Yan Heru to resell at a profit.

The eight cities' granaries had always been empty.

"Hua Hewei..." Shen Zechuan laughed aloud, unable to refrain from marveling with a sigh, "Outstanding of the Empress Dowager!"

If Xue Xiuzhuo were forced to drop his investigation into the Dancheng fields due to the requisition of military provisions and take a step back to express goodwill to the Empress Dowager, then by the time he was done doing it, he would realize that the Empress Dowager had no grains at all, and Qidong could still not mobilize their troops. When the time comes, Xue Xiuzhuo would not only lose his current advantage but also bear the risk of a revolt from the Imperial College. He would even find himself doubted and being called into question by the practical doers faction.

Hua Hewei was not an official of the imperial court.

She had her own way of playing among this group of shrewd and astute men.

CHAPTER 223: TIDE

The gears turned rapidly in Qi Zhuyin's mind in that instant as she weighed up the relative importance of both sides. She had to find the most suitable ally for Qidong in this tussle for power. The victory and defeat of this game were equally important to Qidong; it even determined just how long Qi Zhuyin could remain in the commander-in-chief position in the future.

Qi Zhuyin made up her mind and said, "This humble subject has yet to have an in-depth discussion with the various excellencies from the Ministry of War and Ministry of Revenue, so I'm not familiar with the reserves situation in the various regions' granaries. However, the harvest in the four commanderies of Qidong last year was decent. So if the troops are mobilized, we can manage with some difficulty to hang on for two months assuming we consolidate the grains from the other granaries."

"You are a general; naturally, you understand it more than I do that it takes a month just to advance the troops if you want to continue penetrating deeper into the desert." The Empress Dowager spoke softly. "It's already the third month now. If you hold up the spring plowing of the four commanderies, but still fail to return after two months, then you will end up delaying the autumn harvest in the seventh month. Zhuyin, it's not that I'm unwilling to mobilize troops, but that I can't."

Qi Zhuyin seemed to be stumped, and once again, silence descended upon Mingli Hall.

The Empress Dowager rose to her feet slowly and held her sleeves together<sup>36</sup> as she looked at the various ministers in the hall and advised in all earnestness. "Were the Dazhou's granaries in full abundance, I'd have fought this battle even if Zhuyin didn't ask to. But the imperial court is hard-pressed for money at present and is really in no position to fight a war. Besides, food is the number one necessity of the people. Fight this war, and the commoners of three regions will have to go hungry. Isn't that getting our priorities all wrong? Boran, you saw the Ministry of Revenue's report at the beginning of the year, and you understand the situations in the various areas like the back of your hand."

With Qi Zhuyin in the hall, how would the court ministers dare to speak frankly and refute her? The Empress Dowager was so calm and composed as she forced them to bring up the eight cities. Kong Qiu stood at the side, clutching his own memorial without so much as an expression.

After a moment, Kong Qiu said, "Qidong's mobilization of troops is no small matter. There should have been a specific procedure in place. Commander-in-chief Qi has just entered the capital. Since she has yet to discuss in detail with the Grand Secretariat, why not wait for us to finish the discussion tonight before making a decision?"

By this, Kong Qiu was stalling for time without going along with the Empress Dowager or making a decision for Xue Xiuzhuo. He had transcribed a copy of the account book Liang Cuishan had straightened out. It was truly a pity to have it in hand, yet still be unable to take down Dancheng.

After the court session was dismissed, everyone stepped out of Mingli Hall in successive order. Fengquan stood in front to drape the overcoat over Li Jianting, who slowed down a few steps to wait for Kong Qiu to emerge. Kong Ling raised an arm to guide the way for Li Jianting. He led the Heir Apparent down the stairs and into that open and spacious area.

"Your Highness pulled no punches today," Kong Qiu said. "The suggestion to consolidate the various areas' granaries is indeed an option."

Li Jianting pursed her lips a little before smiling as she said to Kong Qiu, "The Senior Grand Secretary spoke to me about it a little at the start of the year. Naturally, I wouldn't dare to forget about it. It just seems to be too tough to gather sufficient military grains at present."

The day had already broken. Water puddles on the ground invertedly reflected the blue dome of heaven, while the upturned eaves covered up that last dim light of the night.

Li Jianting took a few steps and said, "His Excellency Chongshen is truly outstanding. I heard his mental arithmetic is both fast and accurate, and there would never be a mistake with the accounts that pass through his eyes. Since Dancheng's field taxes case is temporarily deferred, why doesn't the Senior Grand Secretary ask him to calculate the various areas' surplus grains? If the three areas aren't enough, there are still the eight cities. Let everyone work as one."

Kong Qiu said with a bitter smile, "The requisition of military grains now has to come from Juexi, and the quandary right now is broaching the subject of borrowing grains from the eight cities..."

Kong Qiu suddenly stopped talking and turned his head aside to look intently at Li Jianting.

What Li Jianting said was to get the Grand Secretariat to calculate, not to get the Grand Secretariat to investigate, and yet there was a whole world of difference in the meaning of this one word. Whether or not the Empress Dowager agreed to the former, the Grand Secretariat could get Liang Cuishan to do a count of the eight cities' surplus grains. As the Dancheng's accounts were problematic, and Pan Lin was still locked up in prison, the Ministry of Revenue now ought to do a recount of the eight cities' surplus grains; this was the duty of the Ministry of Revenue, and they were not wrong to do so.

The flower embellishment<sup>37</sup> between Li Jianting's brows was brilliantly red, and yet it did not detract from the Heir Apparent's spirited demeanor. She seemed to have just mentioned it in passing, even looking to be a little at a loss under Kong Qiu's gaze.

As soon as Qi Zhuyin stepped out of the palace gates, she saw Xue Xiuzhuo standing a short distance away. She pulled the overcoat off her shoulders and tossed it to Qi Wei, who had come over to receive her. Then she pointed ahead to Xue Xiuzhuo as an indication to talk as they walked.

"I heard from Minister Chen earlier that you were the one who forked out the military salaries this time," Qi Zhuyin said. "Thanks a lot."

Naturally, Qi Zhuyin's word of thanks was not so simple. Xue Xiuzhuo heard the intent behind it and walked for a while with Qi Zhuyin before saying, "Commander-in-chief Qi is mobilizing troops to keep Amu'er in check. The war in the north is at a critical stage. This war ought to be fought.”

Steering clear of the fact that she already had military provisions, Qi Zhuyin said, “Before I enter the capital, I heard that the military provisions this time have to be requisitioned from Juexi. Jiang Qingshan won’t agree to it, will he? You people have your own difficulties too.”

The mornings in Qudu were no longer that cold, and the vendors on the streets started bustling around. As both of them were wearing official robes, no one around them dared to approach. The common folks all kept their distance. Once the pair of them walked past, they looked at Qi Zhuyin again and whispered among themselves.

The Wind Guiding the Scorching Plain, Qi Zhuyin, of the legends was merely tall and lanky. She did not have a herculean physique, nor was she majestically imposing, but she had a certain calm and composure that could stand up to these prying and speculations.

“But you are right. This battle ought to be fought.” The wuzhu ornament Qi Zhuyin was adorned with swung in the wind, and her slightly messy hair at her temples brushed against the side of her cheeks. She continued, “Libei may have revolted, but the Libei Armored Cavalry is still Qudu’s impenetrable fortress in the northeast. The Prince of Libei died in battle, and the battle zone has yet to receive reports of success this year. The fight is indeed tough. You people are far away in Qudu and have limited knowledge of the Biansha Twelve Tribes. Just a few military reports are not enough to fully depict the scale of Amu’er’s ambitions. Don’t keep thinking that they really can’t breach the defenses and invade.”

Qudu was the capital of the Son of Heaven, the culmination of Dazhou’s hundred years of golden age. Unlike the worn and weary frontiers, it had never been under attack. Only seven years had passed since the military defeat of Zhongbo, yet there were no longer any signs of the panic that had been prevalent at that time in Qudu. Here, the fear of the Biansha Cavalry had long faded.

“Amu’er has already taken command of the six tribes, and he’s imitating Dazhou’s military farming system, in which the stationed garrison troops carried out farming duties, in Gedale. If Qidong doesn’t deploy troops this year, Qudu will no longer be able to detach themselves from the matter. I’ll be frank. My soldiers can’t outrun the Biansha Cavalry. If Libei falls and Luoxia Pass can't hold up, then even if the Biansha Cavalry slaughters their way into Qudu, I won't be able to hurry over in time."

The wind intensified. Qi Zhuyin stood still and turned to look at Xue Xiuzhuo. Towering behind her were the vermillion walls with its stacked tiers of upturned eaves soaring into the clear sky. There was not even a cloud overhead. It was in this way Qudu lay bare and exposed to the first light of the day.

"I must mobilize troops." There was no joy in Qi Zhuyin's eyes.

Qidong rarely participated in Qudu's political affairs. Qi Shiyu was smart. Whether it was handling Qidong's relationship with Libei, or maintaining Qidong's amity with the noble clans, he could always find the most appropriate time to pick sides. But not so for Qi Zhuyin. She did not possess the kind of patience Qi Shiyu had. She would rather risk being dismissed and prosecuted by Qudu to attack the Qingshu Tribe, because she knew that the war situation was far more pressing than the political situation.

The trap in which the Empress Dowager set to coerce Xue Xiuzhuo into giving in was brilliant, but she also coerced Qi Zhuyin to get married with Fei Shi, which meant that she would not be giving Qi Zhuyin any noble rank. In fact, she had even shown signs of wanting to split up the military power in Qi Zhuyin's hands.

Perhaps there were indeed people who were more capable of fighting wars than Qi Zhuyin was. However, at this time, at this moment when the battlefields in the north and south were at stake, Qi Zhuyin would never hand over Qidong's military power to anyone else but herself. Since the Empress Dowager already had the thought of moving her, she would never sit still and resign herself to her fate.

"As long as the memorial to mobilize troops can be approved and the deployment order from the Ministry of War can be issued before I leave," Qi Zhuyin suddenly smiled, "then the military provisions that are keeping you at a standstill isn't hard to deal with; I won't forcibly make a requisition for Juexi's food."

Xue Xiuzhuo brushed aside the willow branch that came flying towards him and said, "Deal."

The incense in the hall was a tad strong, and it made Hua Xiangyi feel sick after smelling it for a long time. Matron Liuxiang hurriedly had the maids open the windows. She helped Hua Xiangyi sit on the couch near the window and said ardently, "Third Missy has left for only half a year, and this humble slave can see how much thinner you have become. That Qidong lies close to the desert. It has been hard on the Third Missy."

Hua Xiangyi clutched her handkerchief and said, "Auntie is the one who has lost weight." She turned her eyes to look at the small prayer hall in the inner chamber.

Matron Liuxiang said, "Her Majesty misses the Third Missy, and she prays to the Bodhisattva every day to ask for blessings for the Third Missy. Last time, she caught a cold in the night and wanted to see the Third Missy. Taking medicine didn't work either, so she had this humble slave lit the lamp to read the letters Third Missy sent."

They were in the midst of conversing when the eunuch outside gave a shout to announce the arrival of the Empress Dowager. Hua Xiangyi walked over to greet the Empress Dowager, but the Empress Dowager dispensed with the formalities and held her hands as she stood at the doorway to look Hua Xiangyi over carefully. "Why have you lost weight? Are you not used to the food in the Qi's residence? I picked a few chefs from our Dicheng for you. Take them with you when you leave." The Empress Dowager grew so emotional speaking that her eyes indistinctly glistened with tears. She stroked Hua Xiangyi's temple. "Is my baby girl all well?"

Hua Xiangyi held the Empress Dowager's hands back and choked slightly with sobs as she answered, "I've been missing my aunt."

The Empress Dowager led her inside, her heart breaking on hearing her. She would not let Hua Xiangyi sit at the side when she took her seat on the couch, instead insisting on having her sit next to her. "Does that Qi Shiyu treat you well? What about Qi Zhuyin? I heard those concubines of his are a restless lot who don't know their places. If anyone dares to affront you, get the maidservants to tie them up and send them away. I'll back you up."

Hua Xiangyi broke into a smile through her tears.

The Empress Dowager hugged her like a child and said, "I used to think that I could still send letters when you marry over. Only now do I know how it feels to be so far apart."

The Empress Dowager originally wanted to pick the best husband for Hua Xiangyi, but never in her wildest dreams would she have expected Hua Xiangyi to be eventually married away to Qi Shiyu. To the Empress Dowager's mind, Qi Shiyu had at least been a hero for a lifetime, and except for his age, he could be begrudgingly said to be worthy of Hua Xiangyi. But who knew he would suffer a stroke in the end? The Empress Dowager regretted making this move and wished with all her heart to give all that was good to Hua Xiangyi as she faced her now.

Hua Xiangyi leaned against the Empress Dowager and asked once the latter was done reminiscing, "Is Auntie all well?"

"The principal hall is in such a mess that I can't eat or sleep well." The Empress Dowager paused for a moment before continuing self-derisively. "I'm old, after all. My mind and spirits are not as they were before."

Hua Xiangyi slowly straightened up a little and said in a gentle voice, "Why do you have to go so far as to work so hard? There's the Grand Secretary to assist in state affairs. I heard that the Heir Apparent is a keen learner too."

The Empress Dowager supported Emperor Xiande, so she could also support the Heir Apparent now. In Hua Xiangyi's opinion, Li Jianting was far more reliable than the previous two. Although she was physically in Qidong, she was very well aware of all the major happenings in Qudu.

The Empress Dowager gave a long sigh. She recalled the way Li Jianting looked earlier when she spoke up in Mingli Hall earlier and felt even more on guard against the Heir Apparent. "You are looking at it too superficially. How is that Heir Apparent easy to get along with? She's merely a cheap, lowly lass from out there whom a few scoundrels instigated to challenge me."

After a moment of silence, Hua Xiangyi said, "Having married over to Qidong, I have some understanding of Biansha and Zhongbo. Auntie, Shen Zechuan is now in power in Zhongbo, but he isn't bad by nature. Reclaiming Duanzhou and drawing up the fields again are all good things... I asked Zhaoyue last year how the situation in the City of Dancheng was, and she said Pan Yi couldn't say for sure either. Too many people have died of starvation. The pair of them had the thought to provide aid relief to the refugees, but with the granaries void of grains, there was nothing they could do either."

The Empress Dowager gradually shut her eyes. After listening for a while, she said, "I know you have a kind heart, but this is the moment that decides whether we succeed or fail." The Empress Dowager opened her eyes once again and looked at Hua Xiangyi. "You lived in the palace away from Dicheng, and there are things you don't know. Our family properties were confiscated during the reign of Xiande, and I was stranded and trapped in the harem. During those periods, even the eunuchs of the inner court's yamen dared to come before my palace and blackmail me for silver. There are plenty waiting to humiliate and trample over us had the Marquis of Helian not bribed them. Look at that Xue clan. The legitimate son of lawful birth is a good-for-nothing who squandered away all his family properties and is now being bossed around. Where are his nobleman's dignity and respectability? Then look again at that Xue Yanqing. He's the most bastard of all bastards. His desire to audit Dancheng's field taxes means he wants to use us as a stepping stone for the Heir Apparent. How many of those from the eight cities will be able to escape if we were to be investigated by him for real?"

The Empress Dowager straightened up in her seat too.

"Without the noble clans, what else can I use to vie with them? If there's a problem with the field taxes, I will square the accounts myself in the future. No one else has the prerogative to interfere. And that Shen Zechuan, acting in cahoots with Xiao Chiye. I can tell what they are thinking of doing. You think he's looking at the land under his feet, but he's clearly eyeing the throne. Traitors of such ilk seek fame in everything they do. Shen Wei's treachery is still hanging over his head!"

The words Hua Xiangyi said were already tactful. She watched as the Empress Dowager's chest heaved and knew that the Empress Dowager's mind was already made up. She would never be willing to co-exist with the Heir Apparent. Hua Xiangyi made as if to speak, but stopped as she heard the sudden sound of rain starting up outside; to her surprise, a sun shower had started to fall.

CHAPTER 224: ABRUPT CHANGE

The sun shower stopped as abruptly as it came. Liang Cuishan's swiftly-moving boots were covered in specks of mud. He lifted the hem of his robe and strode through the door, where the officials waiting in the office of the Ministry of Revenue were already all ready to go. He listened as the sound of the rain outside came to a sudden stop and took out his handkerchief to wipe away the thin film of sweat on his face. Succinctly, he announced, "Start the count."

The sounds of abacus beads being flicked noisily in the room started up, as if the sudden rain earlier had begun to fall again inside the office.

Carrying the Grand Secretariat's writ in his bosom, Liang Cuishan sat on the taishi chair<sup>38</sup> and reopened those eight cities' account books that had been stacked up into a pile and buried his head in them to do his recalculations. His mental arithmetic was outstanding, and he understood how taxes worked, so he was pretty fast going through the accounts. But to be on the safe side, he still had an abacus, brushes, and paper prepared within hand reach.

The "rain" in the Ministry of Revenue's office fell throughout the night. Only errand runners went in and out during this time to brew strong tea for the various gentlemen to perk themselves up. In the midst of this din, however, the Empress Dowager did not sleep a wink.

Smoke from burning incense inside her palace spiraled upwards. The Empress Dowager turned the prayer beads in her hand as she reclined on the couch, while Matron Liuxiang pounded her legs in a massage. There was no one else inside this hall. The Empress Dowager, having already removed her eastern pearls, looked rather haggard as she shut her eyes for a nap.

“Commander Han has already communicated with Fuman.” Matron Liuxiang reassured her in a soft voice. “There should be movements on the Heir Apparent’s end by now.”

The Empress Dowager opened her eyes slightly. “The Heir Apparent butted in while we were discussing affairs in Mingli Hall today. I can see that Kong Boran has a change of heart towards her; he really thinks of her as a student now.”

“Isn’t this all instigated by Xue Yanqing?” Matron Liuxiang massaged with rhythmic finesse. “She was raised outside the palace. How would she understand political affairs?”

“She doesn’t know when to stop pushing it, and she has no sense of propriety. Even if she wants to interfere in the affairs of the state, she has to have the capability to. Qi Zhuyin’s reluctance to accede to me today must be because she thinks Xue Xiuzhuo still has a way out. Since they are so anxious to do a count of the eight cities’ surplus grains,” the Empress Dowager scrutinized her hand that had the prayer beads wound around it, “then, by all means, go ahead.”

Under the slightly dimmed lights, the Empress Dowager appeared calm and unruffled, without so much as a semblance of panic.

The more Liang Cuishan did his calculations, the more alarmed he was. He maneuvered the abacus several times under the noisy sound of its beads being flicked, but the result was the same as his mental calculations. There was no problem with the reserves of the Dancheng’s granaries that the Ministry of Revenue was rechecking. According to the calculations of the quantity of these surplus grains, the granaries in the Eight Cities were now Dazhou’s most abundant granaries.

How could that be?

Liang Cuishan pushed away the abacus and stood up, once again wiping the sweat from his face with his handkerchief.

Pan Lin sat back in his chair, his face pale under the candlelight. He had been locked up here for several days. If nothing else, the creased corners of his robe only served to show just how wretched a sight he cut for a young master of a noble clan. He pushed himself to hang on and looked at Xue Xiuzhuo with tired eyes.

“You knew the detailed situation of the eight cities’ granaries when you audited their field taxes at the start of the year.” Xue Xiuzhuo was tired too. He covered his eyes with a damp handkerchief for a moment to gather himself. “The granaries of the eight cities have long been vacant, am I right?”

Pan Lin answered with silence.

“Chengzhi.” Xue Xiuzhuo switched over to calling Pan Lin by his courtesy name. “You let Yao Yuanzhuo go because you are still kind at heart. You are not of the same ilk as Wei Huaigu, so why work for them against your conscience? So many people starved to death in the City of Dancheng last year. If the imperial court is unable to resurvey the fields and return them to the commoners, many people will still die of starvation in Dancheng next year.”

Pan Lin’s Adam’s apple bobbed. He tilted back his head a little and stared at the pitch-dark roof.

“Qi Zhuyin made repeated trips into the capital to ask for the military salaries, and even at this time, the Qidong Garrison Troops still have no way of dispatching their troops. The Biansha Twelve Tribes have already fought their way to the Bianjun Commandery.” Xue Xiuzhuo’s bloodshot eyes from the lack of sleep revealed his struggle, as if he was being tormented. He continued, “Chengzhi, I need grains.”

A moth flew out of nowhere and rested on the window. In the long, endless silence, it took flight once more and lunged into the night. It wandered in the dark, brushing past a speeding horse carriage that came to a stop before a residence. Hua Xiangyi leaped off the carriage just as Hongying lifted the carriage curtain.

“Madam...”

Hua Xiangyi lifted the hem of her skirt and broke into a run after striding through the main gate. The pearls that adorned the hairpin in her hair swung violently as she ran. Gasping for breath, she passed through the labyrinthine front courtyard and long walkways, ignoring the startled shouts around her as she ran into Qi Zhuyin’s courtyard.

Qi Wei was talking to the attendants when he suddenly saw Hua Xiangyi running over. Startled and thinking that there was an assassin, he promptly shouted, “Protect the Commander-in-chief!”

In a split second, the guards in the courtyard drew their blades, their glints mutually standing out in sharp relief with Hua Xiangyi's swaying pearls, masking the cold frost of the moon. Pearls strewn over Qi Zhuyin the moment she opened the door. Hua Xiangyi hastily held up the hair at her temple, which was already covered in a thin sheen of sweat amid her slightly urgent breathing.

"The Dancheng's granaries are empty. No matter how much surplus grains the Ministry of Revenue comes up with in their rechecks," Hua Xiangyi was still clutching her skirt as she looked at Qi Zhuyin, "... they are all a smokescreen."

Qi Zhuyin returned the hairpin she had caught to Hua Xiangyi and looked at Qi Wei.

Qi Wei immediately stepped back, turned around to hurry out of the courtyard, and sent someone to relay the information to Liang Cuishan.

At this time, it was nearing the third quarter of the hour of chou. At the second quarter of the hour of yin, the various imperial court officials had to be ready to wait outside the palace gates. They would then enter the palace for the morning court session at the hour of mao on the dot. Time was of pressing urgency, and no one dared to tarry.

Pan Lin fell completely silent after Xue Xiuzhuo said his piece. He was a man well-versed in the Confucian classics, and he could not bring himself to look directly into Xue Xiuzhuo's eyes. He gazed at the roof and saw the timeworn traces of years of disrepair on the beams. The parts that had not been covered by the new paint lay exposed outside, its exterior dotted with fine insect holes, rotten to the core.

It was in here Pan Lin sat, yet he felt the wind as he silently counted those small holes, killing himself with a blunt blade in that silence. He understood that Xue Xiuzhuo's expression might be just a disguise, and yet he also knew that what Xue Xiuzhuo had said was the truth. In all these days he had been in his cell, his silence had not been all about avoidance.

"Let me ask you." Pan Lin was slow to react as he turned his head around, finally willing to look Xue Xiuzhuo in the eyes. "Why do you want to kill Yuanzhuo?"

Xue Xiuzhuo leaned back in his chair and similarly looked at Pan Lin in the eyes too.

“You want to assist the Li clan, and so did the Secretariat Elder Hai. Both of you supported Emperor Tianchen and replaced Hua Siqian.” Pan Lin shifted his shackled hand onto the table. “But then, you killed Emperor Tianchen for the Heir Apparent... Xue Yanqing, you hide under the waves. I can’t tell if you are a loyal sage or a treacherous sycophant at all.”

Pan Lin needed an answer. With this question, Xue Xiuzhuo could clear up the unbecoming part of him that went against the principles of the virtuous gentlemen. He only needed to give Pan Lin a justifiable reason, and he would have won a landslide victory tonight.

But Xue Xiuzhuo said, “I want to kill Yao Yuanzhuo because he deserved to be killed.”

He no longer looked as prim and proper after having stayed up all night. In fact, he was even willing to loosen up his tightly fastened official robe as he sat across the table.

“The noble clans are always thinking that they still dominate this imperial court. However, they had already long lost control of this carriage towards the end of the reign of Yongyi. Look at your father. If the noble clans had been tough and fearsome enough, would he have needed to be in two minds under the pincer attacks of both the noble clans and those of humble origins? The Zhongbo’s military defeat during the reign of Xiande made me understand one thing.” Xue Xiuzhuo lifted a finger and pointed to the ground. “At the same time the noble clan is infiltrating Dazhou, they are also being infiltrated by others. Hua Siqian thought he could outplay Amu’er in the east, but in truth, he was just a jackal Amu’er trapped while spying on Dazhou. The most ludicrous thing was that even right up until his death, Hua Siqian thought he was the one holding the chain.”

“Secretariat Elder Hai and I watched the Prince of Libei rise to power. The Libei Armored Cavalry became a valiant army in the northeast, but they did not place themselves at the Li clan’s disposal; their surnames were Xiao. No matter how loyal Xiao Fangxu and Xiao Jiming were, the Libei Armored Cavalry no longer accepted commanding generals from Qudu. They call themselves a pack of wolves, and even term themselves an iron wall. That’s right, they are indeed an impenetrable fortress, but at the same time they block out the Biansha Cavalry, they also block Qudu. Had the Empress Dowager not undermined and corrupted state politics, Emperor Guangcheng would have long gotten the Libei Armored Cavalry to disperse during the later period of the reign of Yongyi. It was when they were still called the Luoxia Cavalry that they were truly subordinated to the Li clan's army. Would Xiao Fangxu not understand that? Even so, he was still unwilling to hand over his military power. He believed in himself. He might not have been wrong, but he couldn't control the gradually solidifying armored cavalry."

"Many people denounced Qudu for being paranoid, but who could guarantee that such a large and powerful army would keep on having a clear-headed commander-in-chief for eternity? Even Xiao Fangxu himself knew it was impossible. What is needed to be sitting here is not verbal promises or personal trust, but a real balance and control of power. Xiao Fangxu had long understood that he would have to hand over a son to Qudu, and Secretariat Elder Hai looked for an appropriate opportunity for him to do so in consideration of Libei's friendship and dignity. But before he could act, Hua Siqian, in a bid to make up for the state treasury deficit, handed the Six Prefectures of Zhongbo over on a silver platter to Amu'er. As a result, the reason for Xiao Chiye's entry into the capital became Qudu and Libei's sore point."

"Do you understand now? There are Scorpions from the desert in these waters. Amu'er relied on them to stir up the situation and make Dazhou rot from within. Yet the noble clans feigned ignorance about it. Secretariat Elder Hai and I went through a lot of trouble to support Li Jianheng to ascend to the throne in the hope that Li Jianheng could clean up and sort out the imperial court, but he turned out to be a good-for-nothing through and through!"

"Yao Yuanzhuo's reputation has been built up to a terrifying level, but he would never put it to use for Qudu. If I don't kill him, he will inevitably be used by others. All of you kept Yuanzhuo alive for the sake of the so-called cardinal principles of righteousness. You can now see for yourself the surge of scholars with a literary reputation in the world flocking towards Zhongbo, where he is now giving counsel to Shen Zechuan."

Xue Xiuzhuo paused for a long time before he continued expressionlessly, "I'm neither a loyal sage nor a treacherous sycophant."

What exactly was he?

He did not know.

He received Mister Changzong's guidance during the early years of his education and thought he would be able to become a gentleman of virtue himself. In the past several years, he held Qi Huilian in high esteem and even had exchanges with him before. He thought Qi Huilian could understand his aspirations, but the latter rejected him. He respected Hai Liangyi and was willing to put himself at the latter's beck and call. To this day, he still wanted to address Hai Liangyi as his teacher. However, Hai Liangyi staunchly believed that Li Jianheng could become emperor under his guidance, and Xue Xiuzhuo could wait no longer. He wanted to install on the throne a sovereign that could create a new world. If there was no such candidate, he could only press on and go all out.

He did not need compassion, nor did he need to justify himself. He was willing to pay an exponential price for all that he had done. He had only one life, and he gambled it on Dazhou's twilight years. Whether or not the dawn that broke after the night was the one that he sought, he was still willing to risk his life to pursue it with all his might.

This was Dazhou's last chance, as well as his own.

Pan Lin raised both his hands to cover his face before the table. After a long time, he spoke up. "I was already aware that Wei Huaigu was falsifying accounts when I served as the Vice Minister in the Ministry of Revenue. I also knew there was something wrong with the Dancheng field taxes." He revealed his eyes that were lined with fine wrinkles. "But my name is Pan Lin, and I can only..."

Pan Lin did not continue. He rubbed his face hard a few times.

Hurried footsteps rang out from outside the cell. Pan Lin and Xue Xiuzhuo sat in silence, listening as that noise pressed in towards them.

At the very last moment the door opened.

"Empty."

Pan Lin said wearily.

"The eight cities are all empty."

Xue Xiuzhuo sprang to his feet. Before the functionary opened his mouth, Xue Xiuzhuo made a clean sweep of his fatigue and fastened back his collar, then gave a slight nod at Pan Lin and said, "Thanks."

Shadows moved around outside the cell. Just as Xue Xiuzhuo was about to leave, Pan Lin suddenly piped up, "You subdued your selfish desires to such an uncompromising extent that you are already beyond what the average person can tolerate. As you said it yourself, what is needed here is checks and balances... and what do you have that could let the Heir Apparent hold you in check?"

Xue Xiuzhuo looked askance at him and did not answer.

Pan Lin seemed to have understood something. He watched Xue Xiuzhuo leave. The door to the cell closed with a creak, leaving only him sitting alone in there. Thin ray of morning light peeked through the small window at the side, but did not shine on Pan Lin.

Pan Lin had already done his best.

Pan Xiangjie rummaged through his chests and cupboards in a search of the account books. Those old account books that had accumulated at the bottom of the chests were all sharp weapons that could bring about his downfall! He had heard the news when he woke up, and he had to burn all the incriminating evidence before Xue Xiuzhuo made his way here.

The reign of Yongyi. The reign of Xiande. The reign of Tianchen!

Pan Xiangjie bundled up all of these accounts neatly. He knelt before the chests and untied the rope with his bare hands before throwing all the account books into the copper basin.

There were too many of them for him to burn it all on his own.

Pan Xiangjie's panic was giving him acid reflux. He could never have imagined the breach to be his own son. He had already been driven to a dead end—he could not leave the matter at that!

“The reign of Yongyi...” Pan Xiangjie traced the entries in the accounts with his finger and read them out. “The Hua clan... The Han clan...”

Everyone is in here.

Pan Xiangjie was wild with joy. As long as everyone was in here, his Pan clan would not perish. The sound of running military boots suddenly erupted from the courtyard. Pan Xiangjie clutched the account book tightly and rose to his feet using a chest as a support. Unsteadily, he made his way to the door.

But the one who came was Han Cheng.

Faking composure, Pan Xiangjie covered the book with his wide sleeves and said to Han Cheng, “Things have not come to a head yet, and already the Empress Dowager can't contain herself? Abandoning the pawn to protect the rook is absolutely not the wisest strategy! Xue Xiuzhuo and the noble clans are on antagonistic terms. Even if you cut off my Pan clan today, the others will not be able to escape unscathed either.”

Pan Xiangjie had spent a lifetime pretending to be a senile, old duffer who cowered behind Hua Siqian and Wei Huaigu and fell to his knees at every turn to beg for mercy in the imperial court, yet here he stood today, speaking with lucidity and eloquence.

Han Cheng gripped the hilt of his blade. "Your execution now gives everyone some room to catch their breaths. Who would dare to disregard your kindness? I guarantee your legitimate line of descendants will not die. They will still have an opportunity to stage a comeback one day."

As Pan Xiangjie watched the glint of the blade pressed in towards him, he could not help but raise his voice, "Kill me today, and you'd be merely forcing Xue Xiuzhuo's hand! Once Dancheng is gone, how much longer can Chuancheng last?"

"Cut the crap!" Sweat had also broken out on Han Cheng's forehead. He waved a hand to give the order. "The Empress Dowager has long known that you would leave a way out for yourself. These accounts are in such a mess, and yet you can still remember them so clearly. Burn this courtyard down!"

Pan Xiangjie held onto the door and saw his family members wailing. In that bedlam, he hollered out. "I've long gotten Chengzhi to transcribe these accounts. Go ahead and burn them! Even if you kill me now, these accounts will still fall into Xue Xiuzhuo's hands!"

"Pan Lin's treason is already an established fact." Han Cheng drew his blade out, "Didn't he secretly let Yao Wenyu go? Yao Wenyu is now Shen Zechuan's strategist! The evidence proving your Pan clan's collusion with the rebels is conclusive. So how credible can his words be? He is the spy Shen Zechuan left in Qudu!"

Caught in the thick of the pushing and shoving, Pan Xiangjie fell to the ground. He shouted out, "You cast aside your pawns once they have served their purpose, and you eliminate them once they outlived their usefulness.... like cooking the hounds for food once the hares have been hunted and casting aside the bows once the birds have been shot down! I was a willing lackey for you people, yet this is how it ends today! Han Cheng, even if I die today, how much longer can you live?!"

Being on duty with his Eight Great Training Divisions authority token with him, Han Cheng could wait no longer. He walked towards Pan Xiangjie as the fire blazed and raised his blade for the kill. Unexpectedly, the Qi Wei behind him was even faster. Instead of going around the walkway, he leaped over the ridge of the roof and swooped down from above to knock over Han Cheng, sending the latter tumbling along with him.

Pan Xiangjie took this opportunity to suddenly raise the account book and yell towards the courtyard entrance. "Commander-in-chief Qi, save me!"

In the thick of the scuffle, Han Cheng tossed out the Eight Great Training Divisions' authority token and shouted as well, "The capital troops hold the most authority at the foot where the Son of Heaven is! Qi Zhuyin's troops shall go no further than the outskirts of the city. How dare you obstruct my Eight Great Training Divisions from carrying out its duties?!"

"I asked Commander-in-chief Qi to arrest the criminal minister. I possess both the warrant of arrest from the Ministry of Justice and the deployment order from the Ministry of War. So why wouldn't I dare to?" Xue Xiuzhuo flicked aside the hem of his robe and barked in a stern voice, "Put out the fire and arrest him. Take Han Cheng in as well!"

Han Cheng said, "I am here on the Empress Dowager's decree. You dare to arrest me?!"

The Eight Great Training Divisions soldiers in the courtyard instantly drew their blades and took a threatening step towards Xue Xiuzhuo.

Qi Zhuyin pushed the blades aside with the sheath of her blade and said from the back, "Since the Eight Great Training Divisions are troops of the capital, they are the Son of Heaven's army. The Heir Apparent has asked me to assist in the case, yet you're electing to obey the Empress Dowager instead?"

Han Cheng had initially thought Pan Xiangjie was bluffing him. Who would have expected Qi Zhuyin to really show up?! The reason he dared to kill Pan Xiangjie before Xue Xiuzhuo showed up was that he had the Eight Great Training Divisions in his hands and could use it to strong-arm the Grand Secretariat. But with Qi Zhuyin's troops presently parked right outside the city, he would no doubt be on the losing end if a fight were to break out.

Han Cheng's arrogance deflated some, and he hissed through clenched teeth, "Of course, I shall do as the Heir Apparent says."

The Eight Great Training Divisions returned their blades to their sheaths and watched Qi Zhuyin's guards enter to detain Pan Xiangjie and Han Cheng. That fire did not burn for too long before it was easily extinguished. Xue Xiuzhuo waved away the smoke and dust and picked up a few of the account books that had not been fully burned.

The Empress Dowager was taken aback by the unforeseen developments. On hearing that Xue Xiuzhuo had taken the account books away, she could not help but collapse onto the couch. A deep furrow materialized between her eyebrows as she spitefully lamented, “Pan Xiangjie, that scoundrel!”

In order to save his own life, Pan Xiangjie had dragged everyone down into hot water!

“Where is the Heir Apparent?” The Empress Dowager regained her composure. “Well, then. Xue Xiuzhuo certainly is capable. Since he wishes to fight me to the death, then let him find out for himself if the ‘Destined Son of Heaven’ in his hands is tough enough.”

As the Empress Dowager spoke, she jerked the prayer beads off her hand and chucked them into the burning copper basin, sending up countless splutters of soot.

After his capture, Han Cheng shut his eyes and went to sleep with his face to the wall. He ignored everyone else, sure that Xue Xiuzhuo would not dare to touch him yet. Pan Xiangjie reverted to his previous ways, clutching onto his sleeves as he sat sobbing on the other side of the table.

“Yes, yes... I’ll account for it all...” Pan Xiangjie wiped his tears, “but let me have a bite first. Yanqing, I’m starving.”

This cunning old fellow meant to stall for time by using the account books to blackmail the Empress Dowager and wait for her to rescue him.

Although Liang Cuishan was in charge of taxation, he had also seen such trials before and was aware that these old fellows were not easy to interrogate and put on trial. Having stayed up all night, he took two sips of the strong tea and said after receiving Xue Xiuzhuo’s implied consent, “It also takes time for a meal to be prepared. Your Venerable Excellency can take your time to speak.”

Pan Xiangjie glanced at Liang Cuishan, who did not appear to be angry. “Chongshen, you are on such good terms with Chengzhi, so you know me.” He stroked his belly and pulled a long face. “I’m unaccustomed to going hungry at home, so my mind is currently in a mess.”

“How would I dare to put Your Venerable Excellency to the trouble?” Liang Cuishan set his tea aside. “All you have to do is answer me. I audited the surplus grains in Dancheng yesterday and discovered that the granary was full. Tell me, did you purchase grains from elsewhere to pass them off as the surplus grains just before the Ministry of Revenue’s rechecks?”

“Look, I don’t manage the grains.” Pan Xiangjie innocently spread his hands apart. He seemed to be panicking. “I’m in charge of the Ministry of Works! For the details regarding these grains, you’ll have to ask the Tax Circuit Intendant of Dancheng, or Pan Yi.”

“I asked them long ago.” Liang Cuishan flipped open the account book and showed it to Pan Xiangjie. “They’ve all confessed. You people sold the grains to Yan Heru. Since Dancheng sold its stock, the other seven cities must have too, right?”

“I’m not even sure about the Dancheng accounts, so how would I know about the other seven cities?” Pan Xiangjie knew that this information was likely brought up by Liang Cuishan to trick him. “Since they’ve already confessed to it, Yanqing, go by the books! Report it to the Grand Secretariat and have the Senior Grand Secretary take a look too.”

Xue Xiuzhuo said, “Given that we have to discuss it during the morning court session, it was already reported before the hour of mao.”

For a moment, Pan Xiangjie could not tell whether Xue Xiuzhuo was telling the truth or not when he heard that it was already reported.

Liang Cuishan fished out the writ from his sleeve. “Otherwise, how could we have managed to request your presence here? We naturally followed the procedures in accordance with the constitution of the law; the Ministry of Justice has already given their authorization.”

Pan Xiangjie stared at the document for a long time.

Xue Xiuzhuo leaned in closer and looked at Pan Xiangjie as he said, “Your Excellency is in charge of the administration of the Ministry of Works. I noticed that the dams of Kailing River were well-repaired when the public ditches case happened during the reign of Xiande. This shows that Your Excellency is a practical man who does concrete work and is willing to share the burdens of the common people. My target this time isn’t Your Excellency. Chengzhi is fine. It has not come to the point where he needs to be executed. There’s only a little blip on the Pan clan’s accounts. You’ll still have some leeway left after we sort this out.”

These words were telling Pan Xiangjie that if he continued to remain indecisive, then even this bit of leeway would be gone.

Pan Xiangjie let out a few sobs, his beard drooping as he said to Xue Xiuzhuo, "I really am not sure."

Xue Xiuzhuo said, "Then it appears that Dancheng is the 'private city' of the Pan clan. You deceived the imperial court and colluded with Pan Lin from the Ministry of Revenue to appropriate the commoners' crop fields in Dancheng and falsely report the field taxes. You also resold public grains and conspired with the wealthy merchant Yan Heru of Hezhou, leading to the deaths of countless of citizens. Your Pan clan is solely culpable for all of this."

Listening to him filled Pan Xiangjie with fear and trepidation. Realizing that Xue Xiuzhuo was being serious, he hastened to call out, "Yanqing..."

"The account books and the confession statements have all been transcribed verbatim and submitted to the Grand Secretariat." Xue Xiuzhuo ignored Pan Xiangjie, "Corrupted men like you who pervert the course of justice deserved to have your family properties confiscated to make up for what you owe in taxes and your entire family executed!"

"The account books have not been straightened out yet!" Pan Xiangjie followed suit and stood up. Both his hands were trembling as he pleaded. "Yanqing, Yanqing! We can discuss this over. I haven't given my statement yet!"

Xue Xiuzhuo turned back.

Pan Xiangjie could only say, "These accounts—"

The prison door behind Xue Xiuzhuo suddenly opened, and the clerk, not knowing what had happened, stood up in response. Xue Xiuzhuo looked back and could not help but break out in a cold sweat when he saw that it was a eunuch from the palace.

This out-of-breath little eunuch did not dare to look an imperial court minister in the eyes as he knelt on the ground and hurriedly shuffled forth on his knees a few steps before saying in a fluster, "Your, Your Excellency! The Heir Apparent suddenly fainted before the court session was to start. The Senior Grand Secretary has urgently summoned the imperial physician over. At this moment..."

Just one step shy.

Xue Xiuzhuo's limbs were icy cold, and the hand in which he was clenching the book broke out in a cold sweat. Pan Xiangjie instantly shut his mouth and sat back.

Strikes where it hurts.

The Empress Dowager was truly one tough nut!

Xue Xiuzhuo dropped the account book in his hands and squeezed the words out through clenched teeth, "Set off for the palace."

CHAPTER 225: ADVERSARY

---

Warning: Depiction of child abuse/rape

Fengquan kneeled by the side of the couch and personally sampled the medicine that was about to be fed to Li Jianting.

Li Jianting's face was pale, and her temples were covered in a cold sweat as she lay trembling on the couch. She was covered with a quilt, yet she looked like she was being crushed beneath it. Faint whimpers and sobs escaped her throat alongside her urgent gasps for breath.

The imperial physician inside the palace did not dare to be careless with his diagnosis. He took Li Jianting's pulse again and again through the lowered bed-curtains and wiped his sweat from time to time as he repeated the prescription to the people beside him.

Kong Qiu had faced this kind of situation twice with Hai Liangyi, but this was the first time it had happened since he took charge. His hidden hands under his sleeves were slicked with sweat, and even when his sweat dripped into his eyes, he did not dare to blink.

If the Heir Apparent were to pass away.

Kong Qiu did not dare to think of the repercussions. He closed his eyes with some effort and thought back to that downpour during the public ditches incident. Just how much of a resolve did Hai Liangyi have to steel himself with to say those kinds of words.

Teacher.

Kong Qiu could not help but clench his teeth.

If only Teacher was still around.

Kong Qiu was at such a loss for words now that he was even overwhelmed by the intense sense of powerlessness as he listened to the Heir Apparent's breaking-up voice.

The medicinal decoction was poured down Li Jianting's throat. Her eyeballs were still swiveling. It was as if she was being bound in place by her nightmare. Fengquan kneeled for an entire day. During the interval of time when the palace maids at the sides retreated, he plucked up the courage to gently brush away Li Jianting's damp hair and watched as Li Jianting's expressions underwent a myriad of changes.

The casualties of this game extended far beyond to the innocent bystanders caught in the crossfire. Whether or not the Heir Apparent survived, the palace maids and eunuchs serving the Heir Apparent in her palace were already condemned to death.

Fengquan had to find a way out in this pressing emergency. He still had unfinished business; Li Jianting must not die.

"Your Highness..." Fengquan quietly called out to Li Jianting in a whisper. Due to the close proximity, he saw the tiny hole in Li Jianting's earlobe. He steeled himself and said, "Your Highness struggled to get out of the pleasure quarters and is merely just a step away from the imperial throne. If you lose heart now, you will fail at the last hurdle just when success is within reach... Your Highness!"

It was as if Li Jianting could not hear him. Her fingers clutched at the bedding tightly. She might have been lying in this exquisite splendor, but her mind was still trapped in the world's foulest brothel.

A whimper of a sob lingered in Li Jianting's throat—that was a plea for mercy she made when she was being beaten.

Heavens made a fool of her, giving her such an identity, but had her born a girl. The jingling of earring blended into the din of tables and chairs toppling over. She fell among them countless times, dragged by her hair before those repulsive men.

Xiangyun was a good procuress. She knew how to make the most out of her girls.

Ling Ting was a girl adopted by Xiangyun, but she was not special, for Xiangyun had adopted many a number of children. Xiangyun would lift their heads by the chin to scrutinize them carefully, and from then on, the trajectory of their future paths was decided.

Ling Ting was a pretty one, but she was not likable. As Xiangyun looked her over, she found these eyes of hers surprisingly loathsome.

“You look quite pretty, but also much too fierce.” Xiangyun tapped her pipe. “Might as well blind these eyes. Only then will them cloudy eyes inspire pity in the various lords.”

Ling Ting was thin and small. Xiangyun fed her food and did not really blind her eyes, and for that, Ling Ting was very grateful to Xiangyun. Every day, she watched the men going in and out of Xiangyun Villa to please the courtesans in the brothel. She had no designated master. Instead, she spent all day running barefoot in the corridors serving tea and water for the courtesans, watching them as they applied rouge powder and perfume.

Girls really smell so nice.

Ling Ting kneeled by the door with her hands on the rug as she sneakily sniffed at the fragrance inside like a little puppy. She watched those ample, voluptuous bodies drape themselves with outfits of silk and satin, and watched as those long and slender fingers put on bracelets of gold and jade. She also listened as those courtesans spoke in their sweet, delicate voices, like the pleasant trills of orioles. They fascinated her, making her yearn for the world of women.

With a gorgeous, colorful shawl over her shoulders, Xiangyun stopped beside Ling Ting, looking much like a willow branch swaying in the wind. She had drunk wine, and there was a thin sheen of glow on her face as she chuckled dreamily and bent over to cup Ling Ting’s face. “Doggie... Here, I’ll put an earring on you.”

A pearl that was dangling from that golden thread slid down coldly along the contour of Ling Ting’s ear and fell onto the rug. Ling Ting stared at Xiangyun in a daze. Xiangyun, having already straightened up, laughed as she walked off.

“Madame has an important guest today.” A courtesan inside tossed a vermillion hairpin into the jewelry box. She looked like she could not hold her liquor as she continued, “The Second Young Master of the Prince of Libei.”

A chorus of giggles rang out from the inner room.

Ling Ting did not know who the Prince of Libei was, nor did she know who the Second Young Master was. She carefully picked up the pearl earring and quietly grasped it in her hand.

Drinks were to be served in the brothel in the evening. Ling Ting followed the maidservants in and saw Prince Chu reclining on the couch. He was so drunk he was babbling nonsense. Several noble clans' young masters had been invited along as well, but Xiangyun ignored them all. She sat demurely beside a person's chair, so prim and proper was she that she resembled a fine lady from a distinguished family.

Xiao Chiye was wearing raven blue-colored regular wear, although this way of dressing could not put a muzzle to his frivolousness. He seemed to have drunk wine too, sitting with his arms put up on the chair as he played dice with the young master at the side.

Ling Ting stood in attendance by the side to pour wine for the distinguished guests, doing so for half a night until everyone at the table was drunk. Li Jianheng kept tugging at Xiangyun to keep pestering her to drink up, while Xiao Chiye seemed to have played to his heart's content, although he had never once touched the courtesans at the feast.

Reeking of wine, Li Jianheng pointed out Xiao Chiye to Xiangyun. "This is my... buddy! The son of the Prince... Prince of Libei... He's been on the battlefield..." He belched and giggled cheekily. "Ce'an is the real... deal."

Xiao Chiye burst out into hearty laughter. He lowered his long fingers to toss the dice into the wine vessel,<sup>39</sup> and said with a dismissive, laid-back attitude, "The battlefield stinks to high heavens. How could it be as comfortable as lying in the arms of beautiful women? This Second Young Master is going to drink himself into a drunken stupor here."

Li Jianheng pushed Xiangyun over. Xiao Chiye's hand slipped, and he moved to catch the falling golden vessel. Subsequently, Xiangyun fell into the arms of another. They drank until they puked, and when they finally retired for a rest, the room was a scene of total mayhem.

Under the sounds of the snores, Ling Ting remembered the earring she still held in her palm. She saw a corner of a mirror exposed in the inner room, so she stood on tiptoe and quietly held up the earring to her earlobe in the mirror.

The pearl swung among the fine strands of her hair, glowing resplendently.

So pretty.

Ling Ting was just thinking this when she suddenly heard the sound of wine being overturned, which startled her so much she hastily retracted her hand. As she peeped, she realized that the Second Young Master from Libei was still awake.

Xiao Chiye did not look at anyone. He was clearly right smack in the middle of all this dazzling opulence, and yet he also seemed distant from it all. He did not head into a room, nor did he ask for the courtesans to accompany him. His arm was still hanging over the chair as he gazed out of the opened window in the direction of Libei with a piercing expression and sober eyes.

Ling Ting retreated out of the door and wiped the sweat-stained earring clean. She kept it away, close to her body, and slept with it hidden under her clothes. Not long later, Xiangyun recalled the earring she had cast away.

She summoned Ling Ting to her. While doing her makeup in the mirror, she twisted around and suddenly smiled, "Already twelve years old now, I see."

Li Jianting vomited out all the medical decoction in her throat. The palace maids brought over clean hot water, and Fengquan rinsed the handkerchief in it to wipe down Li Jianting. The world before a semi-conscious Li Jianting was a blur. She felt the hot handkerchief wipe over her temples, the water droplets dripping down like tears.

The Heir Apparent did not wear earring, but Ling Ting did.

"Livestock..." An agonized voice escaped between Li Jianting's teeth. Livestock!

That pretty golden thread of the earring Ling Ting wore flowed among her tears. She struggled to break free, but she was dragged back again and again. She cried and shouted as her head was pressed down, the banging of which caused her forehead to bruise.

Let me go.

Ling Ting sobbed, her raised face wet with sweat and tears. She stared at the closed door, attempting to find a gleam of hope there.

"Madame..." Ling Ting shouted herself hoarse. "Spare me..."

Only the sound of a slap answered her.

Livestock!

Li Jianting's trembling fingers clenched the bedding until it creased. Her chest heaved violently. In those never-ending wails, she recognized herself for who she was.

She was livestock. From the very moment she was born, she was reduced to being nothing more than a sacrifice abandoned in the world's filthiest place, where she became trapped in this narrow and cramped room in the end. Through the crack, she realized everything she had seen in the past was but a mere illusion. Not one of those girls had escaped such a fate. They were all... livestock at the mercy of others.

Ling Ting raised her hand and dug into the crack with her broken nails. Why was she born a girl?

This body was so nauseating!

Ling Ting raked away at that crack like a madwoman and howled outside through those streaks of blood, "Madame..." she said with vehement hatred, "Kill me!"

If she survived this.

If she could live like a human being.

"I..." Ling Ting pressed against her forehead as she cried and laughed at the earring on the ground.

She would kill herself, peel away this layer of skin and flesh, and discard all that had to do with being a girl. She would fight, tear her foes apart with her fangs, and claim back what was rightfully hers!

If only she was given a chance.

"Your Highness!"

Fengquan could not help but raise his voice when he saw Li Jianting vomiting again.

The imperial physician in the outer room had already stood up. Kong Qiu's heart went cold, and he staggered a few hasty steps back. Cen Yu held him in support.

"If..." Kong Qiu could not bring himself to say it.

The hanging screen at the door lifted with a swish. Xue Xiuzhuo's breathing was still ragged. He heard the movement in the inner room and understood what Kong Qiu had left unsaid. However, he was not a physician who could perform miraculous recoveries; he was too powerless in this respect.

The atmosphere in the palace was so heavy and somber that the court officials did not even dare to breathe loudly. The palace maids went in and out carrying the medicine in their hands. Fengquan kept feeding Li Jianting medicine one bowl after another. Li Jianting mumbled to herself. Unable to hear what she was saying, Fengquan could only kneel and lower his head close to Li Jianting's lips.

"Fail..." Li Jianting's lips quivered. "... last hurdle."

Sweat water saturated Fengquan's eyes under the dimness of the lowered bed-curtain. He covered his lips and said softly, "Your Highness is the true phoenix<sup>40</sup> of this world. As long as you can hang in there and survive through this, you will definitely be able to turn misfortunes into blessings!"

Li Jianting's urgent breathing hitched, as if she could finally hear what Fengquan was saying. The whimpers and sobs in her throat gradually subsided. The medicinal decoction was poured down her throat before she choked and coughed it out through her mouth and nose. The palace maids were in such a state of panic that they prostrated themselves on the ground and cried. Ignoring everyone else, Fengquan kept watch by the bed and fed the Heir Apparent her medicine again.

Liang Cuishan, who was still keeping watch on the prison cell, was burning with anxiety. He finished up an entire pot of tea and stood outside to wait for updates. The stars overhead shone bright and resplendent, although he was too preoccupied to admire the moonlight in the courtyard, for he had heard the storm of footsteps coming from outside the courtyard.

"What is this?!" Liang Cuishan could not help but take two steps when he saw the Eight Great Training Divisions enter.

The man at the head raised his authority token and said, "The warrant from the Ministry of Justice clearly states to arrest Pan Xiangjie, yet you people dared to abuse your public position for private interests. Our Viceroy Han is supervising the case on orders of the Empress Dowager, so release him now!"

Liang Cuishan knew this to be the critical moment. Release Han Cheng, and they would not be able to hold on to Pan Xiangjie and Pan Lin too, so he gritted his teeth, squared his shoulders, and raised his head. "I am here on the Heir Apparent and the Senior Grand Secretary's orders to investigate Han Cheng. Without a writ from the Heir Apparent and Senior Grand Secretary, I will not release him!"

The man pressed a few steps closer towards him. "Heir Apparent? The current ruler of the world is the Empress Dowager!"

Laing Cuishan looked at him in horror. Seeing the Eight Great Training Divisions bearing down on him menacingly, he stepped back. "What are you people planning to do..."

"Spies from Zhongbo have infiltrated Qudu. We have sealed the city gate." The man hung his authority token back at the side of his waist. "Naturally, we have to conduct a careful search. Search the compound!"

Everyone from the Eight Great Training Divisions came armed with their blades, so this "search" was obviously not as simple as it literally sounded. Liang Cuishan understood it in an instant. The Dancheng case was pushing the Empress Dowager into such a corner that she was driven to take desperate measures the way a cornered dog would jump over a wall; she could no longer tolerate and accommodate them.

"I am... an appointed official of the imperial court..." Liang Cuishan repeatedly retreated in the face of those sharp blades.

The three ministries' officials who were also in charge of hearing this case fell back too. They were all civil officials, so how could they hold their own against such intimidation? Their past experience at the Nanlin Hunting Grounds during the reign of Xiande returned to haunt the officials, who already had the premonition that a storm was brewing.

"Commander-in-chief Qi is still in Qudu, and yet you dare to be so lawless." Liang Cuishan, having already retreated to the entrance of the prison, bluffed. "Guards of Qidong, show yourselves now!"

The Eight Great Training Divisions men at the entrance promptly drew their blades and surveyed their surroundings with part anxiousness and part skepticism. Qi Zhuyin's guards were all battle-hardened, and there were also thousands of Qidong Garrison Troops standing guard outside the city. The Eight Great Training Divisions merely wanted to seize the opportunity while the Heir Apparent was critically ill to get a head start and kill off these court officials under the pretext of them being spies from Zhongbo. Once day broke, the Qidong Garrison Troops would be too powerless to save the situation even if they charged into the city.

Liang Cuishan took the chance to retreat into the prison and secured the chain around the door from inside. He spread his arms apart and pushed back the officials behind him, and everyone fled inward in a panic.

The Eight Great Training Divisions' blades twisted their way into the chain, pushing so hard against the door that it clattered noisily.

The man said with a malignant smile through the door, “Doggone official! Do you think you are safe just by locking the door? Light the fire!”

Pan Xiangjie, who was in the innermost part of the prison, exclaimed in a panic, “Stop! Don’t set fire! Commander Han is still in here. You can’t burn us all down!”

Liang Cuishan raised the oil lamp and continued, “Those two corrupted officials deserved to be burned to death! However, the flames will surely attract the attention of the garrison troops outside the city, and when the garrison troops fight their way in, it will be you rebels they kill!”

The man outside drew back his blade from the crack with a gloomy and uncertain expression on his face. The Empress Dowager did indeed give the order not to alert the Qidong Garrison Troops outside the city. The Heir Apparent’s life was hanging by a mere thread. He estimated the time and reckoned that since there was still no news from the palace after all this time, the Heir Apparent was likely already dead. Thus, he set his mind at ease, and his expression brightened up a little.

“Your Excellency Liang.” As he spoke, he raised a hand to motion for the squad behind to circle around. “You currently serve in the Ministry of Revenue, where you see shiny money rolling in and out all day, and yet you are still staying in a rundown courtyard. Why do this to yourself? You might as well take this opportunity to cross over to our side where the pastures are greener and your future is bright.”

Liang Cuishan’s heart pounded. Happy to stall for time, he said to the other man, “With that bit of salary I have, I’m content to live in a rundown courtyard.”

“It’s only when you have a great tree backing you that you can relax in the shade.” This man was Han Cheng’s trusted aide. Pacing, he said unhurriedly, “It’s a raging storm out there. How many more days of peace does Qudu still have left? Serve a good master as soon as you can. Only then can you continue to serve the imperial court in the future.”

“We don’t walk the same paths. The Son of Heaven is who we pledge our loyalty to. That is to say, Dazhou—the empire of the Li clan. If we were to switch to someone else, then wouldn’t that be a subversion of ethics and virtues?”<sup>41</sup> The oil lamp in Liang Cuishan’s hand was about to burn out. He continued, “I’d advise you to lay down your blade and repent. It’s not too late to see the errors of your ways now. When the Heir Apparent ascends to the throne, she will still remember this meritorious service of yours.”

The man “tsked” lightly. “In that case, you can see yourself to hell alongside the Heir Apparent.”

He had only just said that when Liang Cuishan heard the small metal window on the wall being broken open. The Eight Great Training Divisions threw a smoking bundle of straw inside. Smoke instantly filled the interior of the prison, choking the officials until they covered their mouths with their sleeves and coughed with tears in their eyes.

Pan Xiangjie was even more certain that the Empress Dowager wanted to kill him. With shackles on his hands, he held onto the bars and yelled under the sounds of coughing, “Chongshen, Chongshen, open, coughs, open the door!”

Han Cheng was startled awake too. He knocked over the teapot on the table and wetted his sleeves to cover his nose and mouth.

Liang Cuishan was choked to the point he could barely stand firm on his feet. The officials behind him knocked over the table and chairs. All of them stumbled into the prison, holding their breath for just a moment before stepping onto the table and chairs to hold on to the metal window in an attempt to breathe. The moment their heads popped into sight, the Eight Great Training Divisions soldiers waiting outside jabbed their blades in to stab them.

“You’re a low-level functionary from the public ditches case who later went on to be promoted,” the man said. “And Shen Zechuan was the Imperial Bodyguard who came down to work together with the Ministry of Revenue at that time, so it seems that you’re the greatest spy Zhongbo planted in Qudu. Vice Minister Pan had you investigate the case, and you colluded with Xue Yanqing to tamper with the accounts books on the sly to frame Vice Minister Pan and throw him into prison. You did so to muddy the waters in Qudu, am I right?!”

Liang Cuishan had indeed been promoted by Shen Zechuan, but he had no involvement whatsoever with Zhongbo. Regardless of his position in Juexi or Hezhou, he had gone by the book. Not once had he ever corresponded via letter with Shen Zechuan. So on hearing the other man putting it this way, he promptly rebuffed, “Slander!”

This smoke was really going to be the death of them. Pan Xiangjie had already started to smash the door, pleading as he coughed, “Chongsh-shen, open the door quick!”

It was not just Pan Xiangjie who could not stand it; even the officials beside Liang Cuishan could not stand it either. Everyone was forced into a dead-end, trapped between the devil and the deep blue sea here. If things did not take a turn for the better soon, they were going to suffocate to death.

Several wardens pulled at the chains. Unable to stop them in time, Liang Cuishan watched as the prison door opened wide and the men around them scrambled over themselves to flee their ways out. They bumped into him, causing him to stumble, but before he could shout, he heard the blood-curdling screams of the officials who had run out as the Eight Great Training Divisions men beheaded them on the spot.

“Mad...” Liang Cuishan supported himself against the wall and covered his face. “You people have gone mad!”

As he was saying so, he received a heavy blow on his back as someone behind him kicked him over to the ground.

Han Cheng spat at Liang Cuishan, covered up his nose and mouth again, and said in a muffled voice, “It’s you band of rebels who are being purged tonight!”

The branches that had begun to sprout in the courtyard rustled as the wind blew up the scattered pages of the account books on the ground and sent them flying all over. Han Cheng’s black boots broke the brush he stepped on. He kicked away the corpse at the side and patted away the dust and ashes on his robe under the stench of smoke and blood.

Liang Cuishan was hoisted out with blades pressing against his neck. His wusha hat<sup>42</sup> had long fallen off, and his hair was a disheveled mess. Gasping heavily, he said, “...Even if the Empress Dowager kills the Heir Apparent, this empire will not belong to her... You bunch of treacherous court officials, destroying the hundred year legacy of our Li clan’s empire...”

He was so overwhelmed with grief and sorrow that for a moment, he could not continue.

Liang Cuishan initially thought he would meet his maker today for sure, but the wind unexpectedly and suddenly brought with it a swift whistle. Then, sunlight broke through the horizon, and the golden glazed tiles of Qudu’s palace instantaneously started to glint. Qi Zhuyin spurred her horse on at full speed and with a raise of its hooves, broke open the gates to the courtyard. As she reined in the horse, she raised her authority token.

“I’m here on the order of the Heir Apparent,” she stared down Han Cheng as her horse’s hooves landed on the ground, “to supervise the capital troops’ search of the city.”

Han Cheng did not believe her. He forced a smile and said, “The Heir Apparent’s life is in imminent peril. How would she have been able to give orders to you? I know you are anxious to save them, but you mustn’t falsify the orders of the Heir Apparent.”

Qi Zhuyin took out the deployment order from her sleeves and tossed it into Han Cheng’s arms. “The Heir Apparent’s writ. Do you recognize it?”

Han Cheng looked at the skewed writing in red ink on the document, which was clearly an order someone approved by holding onto the Heir Apparent’s hand. He fell silent for a moment, his mind parsing over the situation in Qudu. The city gate had already been sealed off, and the Eight Great Training Divisions still had 20,000 men. Qi Zhuyin had traveled light into the capital, and there were only 2,000 soldiers from the garrison troops accompanying her on the journey.

If he made a move right now, they would still have a chance of emerging victorious.

“Before I set off,” Qi Zhuyin bent over, and her wuzhu ornament swung smoothly in the air, “I specifically instructed my old father at home to send someone to pick me up if I didn’t return in half a month.”

Han Cheng clenched the deployment order between his fingertips and looked Qi Zhuyin in the eyes. “Commander-in-chief Qi once said the same thing at the Nanlin Hunting Grounds.”

“My head is not my own.” Qi Zhuyin smiled. “I have to be careful somehow.”

“Back then, the Empress Dowager stood her ground over the dissenting views to fulfill Commander-in-chief Qi’s wish.” Han Cheng put on a fake smile as he stuffed the deployment order into his sleeve. “How could she have thought it would end like this... Oh, well.”

Liang Cuishan fell to the ground. He picked up his wusha hat in his arms and bowed to Qi Zhuyin. “We have Commander-in-chief Qi’s foresight to thank for. Otherwise, it’d have been a bloodbath today!”

Qi Zhuyin said nothing as she watched Han Cheng retreat. It was only when the Eight Great Training Divisions withdrew as well that she moved away the hand that had been pressing down on Zhujiu.

What foresight could she have? She was merely scaring Han Cheng.

Qi Zhuyin's heart sank slightly. A 20,000-strong capital troops were indeed a thorny issue. The Empress Dowager dared to act this way today only because she was sure that they would hold back from taking action lest the innocents were caught in the crossfire; she knew they would not dare to gamble on Li Jianting's life.

Li Jianting's breathing had already stabilized. All the eunuchs and maidservants in her palace had been rounded up and taken down to prison. The poisoning of the Heir Apparent was by no means a trivial matter. For all the safety precautions Xue Xiuzhuo had in place, he still did not manage to guard against the Empress Dowager. The inner palace was a place far beyond his reach.

Kong Qiu said outside the palace, "These eunuchs are all narrowed-minded and short-sighted. They would dare to claim the life of the Son of Heaven if they had suffered indignities before the master and had been instigated by others. This incident has to be rigorously investigated, and the perpetrators, severely punished once they have confessed it all."

Kong Qiu used to manage the Ministry of Justice, and he did not get along with Pan Rugui and the rest of the eunuchs. Influenced by Hai Liangyi, he abhorred the eunuchs to the core. He finished up the strong tea in his hand and said to Xue Xiuzhuo, "Since the thieves have been caught with the loots in the Dancheng's case, then once the fields have been re-surveyed, go by the books and weed out the Six Ministries. See exactly how many people are implicated in this!"

Xue Xiuzhuo's spirits lifted. He understood that Kong Qiu meant to settle the full score with the noble clans, so he nodded his head in acknowledgment.

Cen Yu, who was at the side, seemed as if he had something to say. But in the end, he did not voice it out.

The curtain had only just fallen on the battle in Qudu when Shen Zechuan, who was far away in Duanzhou, received the news.

The sun was shining bright high up in the sky today. Ding Tao and Li Xiong were sitting on the veranda having a match, throwing fruit pits that had been gnawed clean into water puddles. Fei Sheng was unable to free his hands as he was holding on to a bowl of medicine. Qiao Tianya lifted them up directly by the back of their collars.

Ding Tao covered his head with his arms. "We'll pick them up right away!"

"I've been sitting here watching for half a day." Qiao Tianya flicked his forehead. "Aren't you already seventeen or eighteen of age, Tao-er? Why do you look to me like you still have yet to wean off milk?"

The fruit peel still in Ding Tao's mouth was so astringent that he frowned. He responded with the self-righteousness of one who was not in the wrong, "None of you would send me on assignments, so I can only sit here and munch on seeds."

"Munch on seeds." Li Xiong parroted.

Qiao Tianya gave each of them a kick and ordered them to hurry and pick up the pits. He stood under the eaves and watched. A guard at the side came closer to say a word, and he turned back to see Shen Zechuan drinking his medicine and Yao Wenyu in the midst of talking, so he nodded his head to the guard to give the go-ahead.

Not long later, Yan Heru joyfully entered. His daily attire was never of the same pattern, but they all had to be embroidered with ingots and copper coins that shone so brightly he resembled a peacock striding proudly with its head high when he passed through the courtyard.

"Greetings, Commander-in-chief Qiao. Congratulations on your promotion." Yan Heru wrapped his arms around his golden abacus before going up the steps. He craned his head to peer inside and whispered, "How has His Lordship been lately?"

Fei Sheng just happened to step out with the empty bowl in hand. He looked at Yan Heru with cool detachment and said, "Go on in and meet him and you'll know, won't you? Hurry up. His Lordship is waiting."

Yan Heru's dimples promptly materialized. As he went up the stairs, he said, "Of course I'll have to meet him. I'll miss him so much if I don't see him for a day." He smiled at Fei Sheng, squared his shoulders, and walked past Fei Sheng's side at a distance away before making his way inside with a "whoosh".

"Your Lordship!" Yan Heru called out warmly. "I've been looking forward—"

The expression in Shen Zechuan's eyes seemed to be a little frosty as he looked at Yan Heru from where he was before the window, forcing Yan

Heru to swallow back his words. Yan Heru quietly drew his feet back and asked in fright, "Greetings... Your Lordship?"

Sitting beside the table, Yao Wenyu drank his tea and did not look at him even when he heard him.

Shen Zechuan lifted his folding fan slightly and said, "Sit."

How would Yan Heru dare to sit? He was here today to apologize and admit the error of his ways. He immediately pulled up a chair and gestured ardently for Shen Zechuan to take his seat first.

It was presently midday. An unknown species of a bird perched among the branches chirped intermittently. It got a little dry when the temperature rose outside—just the time for sleep. Shen Zechuan ignored Yan Heru's ingratiating attempts and stood by the window, slightly back-lit by the light. The thin breeze brushed his cheeks, sending the agate earring swaying imperceptibly like the rippling waves under the glow of spring.

Yan Heru saw nothing beautiful about this scene; all he could see was the terrifying expression in the Prefectural Lord's eyes, so intimidating was it in his silence that Yan Heru could barely stand steady on his feet.

See, for a man like Shen Zechuan.

Yan Heru tried his best to let his mind wander and groused inwardly to himself.

Once the fear of him had taken root, one would find this beauty of his a blade. The more one looked at him, the more afraid one would be... It was absolutely baffling!

"I heard Qudu is currently investigating the fields in Dancheng." The pulps of Shen Zechuan's fingers rested against his folding fan. "Have you heard any news of it?"

Yan Heru had come prepared; he knew the Prefectural Lord was waiting for him to answer for his actions on his own. He immediately began. "Sure I do. How would I dare not know? Your Lordship, the granaries in those eight cities are all a bluff. They had me sell the grains inside to Mount Luo and Fanzhou. The bandits all love to purchase them." At this point, he paused meekly, as if clueless about the matter. "Didn't Cai Yu tell you about this?"

Of course Cai Yu had not said a thing. Cai Yu did all the manual work in Chazhou for Yan Heru, so how would he know where the grain he handled every year came from? Yan Heru did not reveal a word of this to him and merely fobbed him off by saying that they were grains from the Hezhou's granary each time. All Cai Yu wanted was money, so he would not probe deeper into it at all.

At any rate, you can't go wrong laying the blame on the dead!

Yan Heru's eyes curved into a smile.

Even if Shen Zechuan was all-powerful, he could not bring Cai Yu back from the dead.

"This was also an oversight on my part. I forgot to notify Your Lordship of this." Yan Heru put on an act. "Punish me, Your Lordship. I didn't think this matter was of importance."

Now that he put it that way, it did indeed seem to be the case. In any case, they were doing business in the east and would not be reselling grains in the future, so the page on past matters ought to have been turned. But if one delved deeper, that would no longer make any sense. What Shen Zechuan had been forcing down in Zhongbo was the price of grains that Yan Heru had raised. Since the refugees from the eight cities had fled into Zhongbo, Shen Zechuan had to estimate the surplus stock of the eight cities before he could compete with them.

Shen Zechuan seemed to be considering something. He turned his head back to continue to look out of the window. "You shifted away and emptied out the grains in the eight cities' granaries. With the commoners' fields issue unable to be resolved by this year, the eight cities and Qudu can only requisition grains from Juexi, Hezhou, and Huaizhou. So it turns out you've been holding their lifeline in your hands all along."

To Yan Heru's ears, it sounded like Shen Zechuan was complimenting him, but he did not dare to answer rashly because Shen Zechuan was indeed a cunning one. Who knew if he was waiting for him to fall into a trap somewhere. Yan Heru responded, "I've turned over a new leaf after throwing in my lot with Your Lordship. I'm not into that business anymore, and they have long forgotten about me."

"You were able to obtain grains from Juexi in the past while hiding it from Jiang Qingshan. Unlike the situation in the eight cities, you counted on Xi Hongxuan." A bug landed on the edge of the window. Shen Zechuan watched as it dodged here and there under his folding fan and continued, "It only came to my mind recently. Xi Hongxuan was reselling public grains too. If both of you were to happen to run into each other in Juexi, how would he have been able to tolerate you?"

Xi Hongxuan was the lawful son of a noble clan. What's more, he had his money vaults as surety, so it was not unusual for him to be highly sought after in the official circles. It was too hard for Yan Heru to butt into the public grains trade in Juexi. He had to have an unconventional gambit before he would have a fighting chance. Shen Zechuan knew from reviewing that Dunzhou name list that the officials Yan Heru bribed were all crooked men who had resold public grains and copper ores with Xi Hongxuan before. With this leverage in hand, Yan Heru followed behind Xi Hongxuan, scavenging whatever he could, but it could not fill his stomach, and so he dipped his hands in the eight cities' granaries.

"It was a coincidence." Yan Heru grinned. "That fat slob Xi the Second had such a tight hold over Juexi all thanks to his own money vaults, so I could only seek an alternative way out."

The Eight Great Clans wanted to level the playing field among themselves, so naturally, they would not be willing to let Xi Hongxuan eat up this sum of windfall profits; the Xi clan was already rich enough from lining their pockets. The Yan clan of Hezhou was just the opposite. Yan Heru was young, and there was no one in his clan who served in the imperial court. It was simply a cinch for the noble clans to hold him under their thumb. But this lad was so crafty that he made a sizable fortune as an intermediary and threw the pittance of profit he did not give a hoot about to the noble clans. That way, the noble clans still thought that they had profited.

The interior of the hall fell silent after Yan Heru was done talking. Yan Heru seemed not to have noticed the murderous undercurrent of killing intent running beneath Shen Zechuan's silence as he continued with his hands behind his back. "At the end of the day, His Lordship is also happy to see it happen, yes? Xue Xiuzhuo is so vicious to want to re-survey the eight cities' crop fields. I don't even have to do any calculations to know that they will not be able to make up for the arrears in field taxes. It'll be a dog-eat-dog fight once they are pushed into the corner, and when the time comes, Your Lordship will be able to take down Qudu effortlessly."

Shen Zechuan turned slightly sideways to look at Yan Heru again. Softly, he said, "Oh, so I'm supposed to be thanking you, huh."

Yan Heru's hair stood on end. His dimples faded as he met Shen Zechuan's eyes and responded, "... I'm just saying."

"And that's the end of it?" Shen Zechuan asked.

Yan Heru almost wanted to laugh out loud, but he did not dare to. He knew it. Shen Zechuan wanted to seize the opportunity to fleece a sum of money out of him.

Damn it.

Yan Heru fumed inwardly to himself.

How much silver had Shen Zechuan successively allocated away from him after the seventh month last year? Sure, the trade route was valuable, but Yan Heru had his eyes set even farther. He knew he could clearly earn more. Leaving aside the grain business Shen Zechuan had pulled the plug on... the grains to be transported to Qidong this year were the real money drainer. Then there was the new port they were building right now in Juexi... Shen Zechuan was really going all out to rip him off!

But he, too, had a way to push back.

“I heard last year that the Second Master was looking for the Venerable Master Yideng. Coincidentally, my men picked him up in Hezhou last month. I rushed over without stopping this time precisely to inform the Second Master of this.” Yan Heru flicked the beads on his golden abacus. “Does Your Lordship want him or not?”

Shen Zechuan raised his head slightly to look at Yan Heru. Very softly, he started to chuckle.

CHAPTER 226: MAGNANIMITY

The scorching sun blazed so hot that the Armored Cavalrymen on the military drill grounds were dripping with sweat all over.

A chill ran down everyone's spines at the twang of the Conqueror Bow being drawn. Following right after, three arrows struck the target one after another, their heavy, dull thuds reverberating through the military drill grounds. Xiao Chiye lowered his arm and reloaded an arrow.

"The new blades Master wanted have arrived." Chen Yang stood by the side, lifting the quiver for Xiao Chiye. "I have checked over the goods with Wu Ziyu this morning; they're all quality blades forged by the military craftsmen from Dajing."

Xiao Chiye raised his arm and stared at the target. The arrow struck the bullseye with a "thud".

Chen Yang handed over an arrow and waited for Xiao Chiye to empty out the quiver before passing him a towel. With the sun hanging over his head, Xiao Chiye wiped his sweat and asked, "Is he here?"

Chen Yang looked back towards the entrance of the camp. "Should be by now."

It was presently midday. Snow that had melted in the Sha'er Camp flowed into the ditches. It was so hot that waves of heat were visibly radiating off the ground. A boundless expanse of withered and yellow grassland stretched on infinitely outside the entrance of Sha'er camp. Propping himself against the camp wall, Gu Jin saw billowing waves of flying sand on the horizon.

“Open the camp gate.” A soldier stationed above shouted below.
“General Guo is entering the campgrounds!”

Guo Weili had already led the Armored Cavalry before the camp while the gate was gradually being hoisted. He pulled the reins of his horse and removed his helmet, then ran a hand through his soaked hair as he waited for the bridge to fall over the ditch before the campground.

The falcons Guo Weili had brought over hovered before the camp, hesitant to advance ahead, while a commotion broke out in the falcon cage within the campground. Meng monopolized the very top of the watchtower, where it stared down the newly arrived falcons.

A change began to come over the atmosphere in the campground. The Imperial Army, who were initially squatting by the foot of the wall to relax in the shade, all rose to their feet to watch the camp gate open with a myriad of expressions. Gu Jin did not move as he locked eyes with Guo Weili, neither of them willing to give way.

It was common knowledge that Guo Weili and Xiao Chiye did not get along. Guo Weili's framing of Gu Jin at the Tudalong Banner was the thorn that stood between them both. In addition, he had repeatedly clashed with the Imperial Army at the Shasan Camp. Tension was stretched so taut between both mutually antagonistic parties that it was at a snapping point. Who could have expected Xiao Jiming to transfer Guo Weili over to Xiao Chiye's command with one deployment order?

Wu Ziyu came out of the tent and stood far away, not wishing to get caught in the crossfire.

Guo Weili's present commanding general was Xiao Chiye, and this meant that whether or not he would still be able to step onto the battlefield was now entirely at Xiao Chiye's discretion. Gu Jin was Xiao Chiye's guard, so it was impossible to simply turn the page on the framing incident and let bygones be bygones. No one knew if Xiao Chiye would make life difficult for Guo Weili or deploy him out of the main battle squad. No matter the decision, neither boded well for a Sha'er camp that had only just been rebuilt.

Once the bridge was fully lowered in place, Guo Weili steered his horse across and led his squad into Sha'er camp. Gu Jin walked down the steps and stood in the middle of the stairway to watch them enter.

Xiao Chiye did not turn back. He set the arrow he had retrieved onto the bowstring again and concentrated his attention on the target.

Thud!

Guo Weili heard the sound of the target being struck. He held his helmet in one arm and saw the Conqueror Bow glinting under the sunlight. After a moment, he turned and dismounted.

Chen Yang led his men over to receive him. Guo Weili handed over his token, and Chen Yang looked it over before raising his head to say to him, "The original squad can no longer be used and has to be disbanded on site. Head over to register in the tent at the east end. We will assign the members into open vacancies."

"Hasen came a few days ago," Guo Weili said. "The wall on the eastern side of Shasan Camp has completely collapsed. Find an opportunity to report it to Dajing. We need military craftsmen to repair that portion."

"Did Hasen bring along the stone catapults?" Chen Yang clamped the book under his arm. After Guo Weili nodded, he turned his head towards the Imperial Army on the other side and yelled, "Go get Meng Rui and tell him to bring the military craftsmen over." Chen Yang then looked at Guo Weili again. "I'll arrange for the military craftsmen to head down to Shasan Camp to repair the wall right away. You go on ahead and report to the Second Master."

Guo Weili pressed the tip of his tongue against his canine tooth that was missing half of it and turned around to face Xiao Chiye. Xiao Chiye paid him no attention. He seemed focused on the Conqueror Bow, almost piercing through that particular target with his shot.

The weather in Libei this year was abnormal. It was only the middle of the third month, and yet the battle zone was as hot as it was in the fourth or fifth months in previous years. Guo Weili did not take off his armor and simply stood there roasting in the scorching sun until he was perspiring profusely. His inner garment was so damp he could even wring water out of it. It stuck to his body, working hand in hand with the heatwaves to make him irascible.

Guo Weili wiped his face and suddenly shouted at the top of his voice, "Guo Weili of the Shasan Camp is here to report to Second Master!"

Xiao Chiye stayed his hand and did not fire the last arrow.

"Hasen launched a sudden assault on Shasan Camp four days ago. The right flank of the Armored Cavalry was wiped out, and the eastern side of Shasan Camp suffered heavy damage." Guo Weili stepped back. "The above are the military updates General Zuo wants me to relay."

Without even wanting Xiao Chiye's response after saying his piece, he turned around to leave.

Even if Xiao Chiye were really going to abuse his power and deliberately make things hard for Guo Weili, Guo Weili would also resign himself to his fate, blast it all. There was nothing for him to say. As long as he could—

Before Guo Weili got to finish his thought, an arrow hurtled past his ear with a "whoosh", bringing along with it a menacing sharpness that his ear could clearly sense. The arrow stabbed into a pillar a few steps away. Had Guo Weili been walking too fast earlier, this would have been his head.

Bloody hell!

Guo Weili instantly looked back with a livid expression. "If Second Master wants to kill me, just say it outright!"

Xiao Chiye's expression was scathingly frosty and grave as he held the Conqueror Bow in hand. "So you know I want to kill you too? Guo Weili, last year when Gu Jin escorted the military grains to the battlegrounds, he encountered an ambush near the Tudalong Banner. He traversed across the marshland to return to Changzhu Camp, where you shield the patrol squad under your command and indiscriminately had him bound to apply torture on him. You even stripped him of his military rank and framed him for colluding with the Biansha Cavalry—so tell me, based on all the above, should I or should I not kill you?"

Gu Jin accepted the arm guard handed to him and descended the steps.

Guo Weili had framed Gu Jin for Xiao Jiming's sake. Everyone was perfectly aware of this. But Xiao Chiye found him a reason that could be taken out into the open. By this, he meant to deal with him.

Guo Weili flung away his helmet. "That's right. I did it. Kill me if—"

Gu Jin approached him from behind and hauled Guo Weili by the back of his collar. At the same time Guo Weili looked back, Gu Jin threw a punch that knocked him to the ground.

This one punch was so violent that Guo Weili felt the remaining half of his canine tooth begin to shake. He spat out the blood froth in his mouth and cursed, "Fuck!"

Without waiting for Guo Weili to stand up, Gu Jin kicked him in the chest. Guo Weili went rolling, his entire face smeared full of yellow sand. He wiped hard at the sand on his face. Gu Jin yanked him up and elbowed him over to the ground once again.

Guo Weili felt as if his cheeks were going to split apart from the blows, but not once did he fight back as he let Gu Jin pummel him until the metallic taste of blood saturated his mouth.

“This is what you owe me.” Gu Jin waited until Guo Weili was bent over the ground, gasping heavily for breath before he removed the arm guard and tossed it at his side with a noisy clang. Recovering from his slightly ragged breathing, he continued, “And now you’ve repaid it all.”

Not only was Guo Weili stunned, but even Wu Ziyu, who was standing a distance away, was struck dumb too.

Guo Weili propped himself up with both arms, spat out all the blood in his mouth, and staggered to his feet. Chen Yang tossed his helmet to him. Guo Weili was still feeling flummoxed.

That’s it?

But he almost lashed Gu Jin to his death.

Gu Jin took a few steps back and said, “The personal grudge between you and me is written off as of today. If you have anything to say, lay it all out on the table. You’re Second Master’s soldier, and I’m Second Master’s guard. When we step out of Sha’er Camp hereafter, you and I are kin brothers who have each other’s back. The day we part ways will be the day this war ends.”

The scene everyone expected to play out did not materialize. Libei’s morale was low this year. As Xiao Chiye’s guard, Gu Jin was unwilling to let Xiao Chiye lose the hearts of Shasan Camp’s soldiers any further because of this matter. Xiao Chiye gave Gu Jin the authority to handle it as he deemed fit, and Gu Jin was willing to use such a method to resolve the issue because he was a real man who could not and would not play dirty.

Guo Weili initially thought that he would be injured if not dead today, but who knew Gu Jin would be this magnanimous? Even he felt small standing before Gu Jin. He rubbed at a bruise on his face, and despite feeling a little reluctant to concede defeat, he was also a little impressed.

He who can tolerate his shame and endure humiliations is a real man of character.

Guo Weili was usually a game drinker who drank to his heart’s content and a valiant fighter who fought like there was no tomorrow. He boasted of being a man among men, and so would not easily speak of the word “concede defeat” to another. Gu Jin suffered such great humiliation at the Tudalong Banner, and yet he could use such a method today to defuse the awkwardness between both parties. He not only saved Guo Weili from punishment but also won over Shasan Camp's heart for Xiao Chiye. Gu Jin was representative of Xiao Chiye; his actions reflected upon the latter, and whether on a personal or professional level, Guo Weili truly had to hand it to him for de-escalating the conflict in this way.

Xiao Chiye raised an arm to let Meng perch. In the wind, he recalled the words his old man had said before he left. Gu Jin went to such lengths all to smooth the path ahead for Xiao Chiye. He was telling everyone in the battlegrounds:

Second Master was not an intolerant man who could not accommodate others.

When the sky darkened, Guo Weili sat by the campfire and roasted his field rations. His face was decorated with bruises all over. Wu Ziyu sat across from him with a rice bowl in hand. Guo Weili cast a glance at Wu Ziyu but said nothing.

"Meals are provided in the camp." Wu Ziyu snatched Guo Weili's field rations away. "Go over and ask for it. Why are you squatting here gnawing on field rations instead?"

Guo Weili covertly clenched his now empty hands and said testily, "Are you that much of a busybody? What the fuck has it got to do with you?"

"Don't tell me you're too embarrassed and awkward to do so?" Wu Ziyu stuffed two spoonfuls of rice into his mouth. "Gu Jin already said it's all water under the bridge now."

Guo Weili picked up a piece of firewood and poked the campfire.

The Imperial Army was having a whale of a time on the opposite side; this group of army ruffians was still the same as ever.

After a moment of silence, Guo Weili said, "Second Master attacked and killed the Duanzhou's Scorpions at the Chashi Sinkhole?"

"What's more, he defeated them while outnumbered." Wu Ziyu gestured with his fingers.

Guo Weili scoffed, "And the main force comprises the Imperial Army, right?"

"Bullocks. Just how many Imperial Army soldiers went?" Wu Ziyu did not share that much camaraderie with Guo Weili, and he had been rubbed the wrong way many times by Guo Weili before, so he said, "Be reasonable, will you? Which part of the Second Master doesn't cut it? Second Master was the one who took back Shasan Camp, and the person he cut down that time was Huhelu, who was your nemesis for half a lifetime. And now, he's killed off the head Scorpion of Duanzhou. Second Master is still willing to use you after what happened with Gu Jin—this is what I call magnanimity. So cut it out with your ungrateful attitude!”

Guo Weili stabbed at the campfire until sparks spluttered all over. He lifted the smoking stick of firewood and pointed it at Wu Ziyu.

Wu Ziyu was not in the least bit afraid of Guo Weili. He used to be in the convoy squad in the past, so there was nothing he could do about being overshadowed. What's more, he had no opportunity to step onto the battlefield, and all that holding back had turned him into a good-for-nothing. But it was different now. He was the one who seized back Duanzhou. Although credits also went to Xiao Chiye's diversionary tactic in luring the enemies away from their base, he did indeed fight the battle to reclaim the city, regardless of the number of people he used.

“There have not been any victorious battles this year. You butted heads with Hasen before, and our Armored Cavalry isn't on par with the Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops currently stationed at the Shayi Camp.” Wu Ziyu set down his chopsticks. “Can you beat the Scorpions in a fight? No, you can't. Can Zhao Hui? He can't do it either. So why not follow under Second Master's command?”

“Am I not doing just that now?” Guo Weili was a bad-tempered man who spoke in a very blunt tone. “How else do you want me to follow him? By shadowing him hot on his ass? Bloody hell, how did the Armored Cavalry dodge the iron hammers?”

“It was epic.” Wu Ziyu gave him a thumbs up. “You can bloody well go figure it out yourself.”

Guo Weili watched Wu Ziyu walk away. When Wu Ziyu was almost engulfed in the darkness of the night, Guo Weili suddenly jolted to his feet and cursed, “My rations!”

Wu Ziyu had long fled.

Xiao Chiye looked at the newly delivered blades under the candlelight. These longer and thinner blades required the Libei Armored Cavalry to adapt to them. He lined up a formation in Sha'er Camp, and repeatedly thought about what he had obtained from the Chashi Sinkhole.

On the other end, Chen Yang and Gu Jin entered the tent, and Xiao Chiye caught the aroma of milk.

“Master, there’s a letter from the Prefectural Lord delivered along with the supply wagons.” Chen Yang set the letter from Duanzhou on the small table at Xiao Chiye’s side. “The Mount Luo riding stables are beginning to take shape, and the repairs of the Zhongbo bridle paths are coming along so fast that access will be available by the end of the fourth month.”

Shen Zechuan was dumping hordes of money on it, so how could it not be fast?

At this thought, Xiao Chiye remembered Qudu. He kept the blade away in its sheath and tore open Shen Zechuan’s letter in between sips of his milk tea.

“The Venerable Master Yideng is in Hezhou...” Xiao Chiye hesitated for a moment before looking at Gu Jin. “Why is the Venerable Master Yideng in Hezhou?”

Gu Jin, who had a new robe hung over his arm, thought for a moment after hearing the question, then shook his head and answered, “Why would the Venerable Master Yideng go to Hezhou? Master, the Venerable Master left his home in Hezhou in his early years to become a monk. All these years, he has only been willing to roam around our Libei.”

“That’s really strange.” Xiao Chiye inexplicably felt displeased. “I dug to the center of the earth, and I couldn’t even find him. How could he have fallen into Yan Heru’s hands?”

Chen Yang collected the empty bowl and said, “That Yan Heru is a coward who is mortally afraid of death, and Zhongbo was in such mayhem last year, so he wanted to seek out the Venerable Master as an insurance to preserve his life...”

Chen Yang’s voice gradually trailed to a stop. Silence reigned in the tent for a long time.

Xiao Chiye was looking for the Venerable Master Yideng. There were already rumors of this spreading around since the sixth month last year. If Yan Heru already had the Venerable Master’s whereabouts a long time ago, then why did he not say a word instead of keeping it quiet until now?

“I’ll be at Sha’er Camp these few days.” Xiao Chiye folded the letter. “Gu Jin, spur your horse down south tonight to Duanzhou to keep watch over the Prefectural Lord. Come back if the Venerable Master arrives without a hitch. If not...”

Xiao Chiye's eyes were an abyss of darkness.

Yan Heru sneezed several times in a row. Clutching his handkerchief, he blew his nose and rubbed it until its tip was red. He sat on the chair with his head craned to watch Yao Wenyu writing. "This character of Mister Yuanzhuo can be likened to flying eagles and darting hares. Not only are the strokes strong and firm..."

Yan Heru launched into a series of flattery and smiled at Yao Wenyu again when he was done.

"Mister, wanna crack melon seeds? It's rather boring to be sitting here. When will His Lordship be done handling the cases? Is he this busy every day? In that case, he has to take care of his health. It'd be bad if he were to burn his body out. However, the Venerable Master Yideng is already on the way. Going by the schedule, I reckon he will more or less arrive in a few days. When the time comes, I'll get the Venerable Master to take a look at your legs. No doubt he will be able to make you stand up on your feet again."

Yao Wenyu's brushstroke skewed aside, although he showed no trace of anger on his face and merely looked at the paper regretfully.

Feeling out Yao Wenyu's expression, Yan Heru leaned over the edge of the table and said, "Do you hate Xue Yanqing for subjecting you to such a misfortune? He's really wicked, man. Why not you team up with me to set up a trap for him? We'll take advantage of the chaos to off him and hang his exposed corpse up in Qudu for several days to appease your hatred!"

With a slight frown on his face, Yao Wenyu set down the brush and said, "Such an act is too depraved."

Yan Heru revealed a look of understanding and said, "You're a scholar, and scholars are all sticklers for this, but not so for merchants like us. A fool is the one who does not avenge a vendetta. The more you double down on settling the score and making him pay for it, the more gratifying it is."

Yao Wenyu felt his words to be loaded with meaning. At the same time he rolled up his sleeves, he made to speak.

But Yan Heru raised an index finger and hushed him with a quiet "shh".

The interior of the room fell silent, making the sound of footsteps in the courtyard particularly clear. Shen Zechuan, who had been in the principal hall, seemed to have stepped out and was now standing under the eaves listening to someone who had come to submit his report.

Qiao Tianya had originally been standing on the side, but upon hearing the report, his expression changed. He repeated, "Overturned?"

"Overturned!" The Imperial Bodyguard delivering the message said as he wiped his sweat. "Your Lordship, the horse carriage was stuck outside Fanzhou. Luo Mu did not even have the time to send men to receive the guests in it when the carriage overturned!"

Fei Sheng pressed in a step closer and asked with urgency, "Where's the Venerable Master?"

Inside the room, Yan Heru covered his mouth, and with his eyes darting around, said regretfully to Yao Wenyu, "Heaven be my witness. This has nothing to do with me at all. I've been right here in front of you and His Lordship."

His doe eyes were so harmless, but they sparkled with malice within.

"Heaven help us all now."

CHAPTER 227: CHILD PRODIGY

“The horse carriage from Hezhou had already arrived when the men we sent to receive them reached Chazhou’s borders. They were being chased by the Hezhou yamen and did not dare to stop for a break on the way. The carriage overturned on the old bridle path outside the city of Chazhou and plunged into the stream.” The Imperial Bodyguard hesitated a little before continuing, “It broke to smithereens on impact... There were no survivors.”

The guards in the courtyard all fell as silent as the cicadas in winter. Only the sound of running water could be heard. The bamboo tube knocked against the rock, and newly replaced water from the pond washed over the rock’s surface, turning the remaining mosses black.

Fei Sheng’s heart sank. He instantly looked at Shen Zechuan.

Contrary to expectation, Shen Zechuan’s expression was calm. After standing under the eaves for a moment, he asked, “Why was the Hezhou yamen chasing after the horse carriage?”

“They exposed their whereabouts when passing through the checkpoint and lied that they were relatives of the Yan Clan,” The Imperial Bodyguard reported. “But who knew that Qudu had issued an imperial edict in recent days, and the entire Hezhou is on the hunt for Yan Heru. The moment the yamen heard they were relatives of the Yan clan, they thought they were absconding to flee punishment.”

It was so much of a coincidence that it seemed as if even Heaven was hampering the Venerable Master from arriving in Zhongbo.

Fei Sheng did not believe this coincidence, and neither did Qiao Tianya. The people assigned to receive the carriage were all elites. If they said the horse carriage overturned, then it really overturned and was not tampered with—at least, no tampering that was noticeable at a glance.

Interesting.

Shen Zechuan had already concluded that the Venerable Master Yideng had likely met with a mishap even before the Imperial Bodyguard answered. Otherwise, they could jolly well resolve it themselves instead of reporting it to Shen Zechuan. If Yan Heru had treated the Venerable Master as his trump card, then he had shown his card too eagerly this time, so much that Shen Zechuan found it hard to believe right from the start that he would really hand over the Venerable Master.

If that was the case, where did Yan Heru get the guts to do so?

Shen Zechuan put up his folding fan to stop Qiao Tianya from speaking. He glanced at the side hall and said, “It’s already so late now. Go and get ready.”

With a solemn expression on his face, Qiao Tianya retreated.

When Shen Zechuan lifted the hanging screen and entered, Yao Wenyu had already gone out. Yan Heru was shaking his leg as he fiddled with his golden abacus. He was not proficient at mental arithmetic, but pretty adept in doing calculations with the abacus, flicking away at the abacus beads noisily without even messing up the numbers in his mind.

“What happened to the Venerable Master Yideng?” Yan Heru flicked the last bead away. When Shen Zechuan sat down, he leaned over and said to him across the table, “I heard commotion.”

There was no one waiting in attendance inside this room, so Shen Zechuan poured himself a cup of hot tea. Amidst the willowy, spiraling steam of the scented tea, he succinctly answered, “The carriage overturned.”

Yan Heru let loose an exclamation of surprise. “How?! Is the Venerable Master alright? I’ve been reminding them to be careful, and I even specially sent my best men at home to tag along.”

Shen Zechuan did not drink the tea. Instead, he pulled over the empty porcelain saucer on the table and poured the tea in as if he was rinsing the cup. With a gentle shake of his head, he said, “They said the carriage plunged into a stream in its frantic escape from the pursuit of the Hezhou yamen. Everyone in it was killed on the spot. What a pity. I was waiting for the Venerable Master to extend my lifespan this year.”

Yan Heru’s expression underwent a slight shift. “The Venerable Master is gone?”

Shen Zechuan pressed the scalded, empty cup between the pulps of his fingers and raised his eyes to look at Yan Heru. He repeated, “The Venerable Master is gone.”

There was originally no ripple of emotion in Yan Heru’s eyes, but with Shen Zechuan looking at him, uncertainty gradually washed over his expression. Tentatively, he pointed out, “... I’ve already handed him over.”

Shen Zechuan loosened his grip, and the empty cup fell onto the table, where it rolled several times and bumped against the edge of Yan Heru’s golden abacus. The lights in the room were all at the back, partially obstructed by the hanging bamboo blinds. Shen Zechuan did not speak for a long time. He scrutinized Yan Heru with interest, unable to find the slightest trace of concealment on this face. Just on this point alone, Yan Heru was better than Xi Hongxuan.

At this thought, Shen Zechuan smiled. He lowered his folding fan and propped it up on the tabletop. “This is an unexpected misfortune; how can I blame you for it?”

Contrarily, Yan Heru could not figure out what the Prefectural Lord was thinking when Shen Zechuan did not fly into a rage, but he had come to have some understanding of Shen Zechuan in this past six months, and he knew this was not the moment to get anxious and rush the matter. Shen Zechuan was best at psychological warfare and playing mind games. He only had to drop his guard a little, and the Prefectural Lord might do an about-face and turn hostile.

“Your Lordship is magnanimous. As expected of someone worthy of being an overlord,” Yan Heru said. “I’ve seen so-called heroes elsewhere, but none of them come close to being as astute as Your Lordship. What should we do now that the Venerable Master is of no more? I can see Mister Yuanzhuo’s illness worsening by the day. We have to get it treated, man.”

“A physician is easy to find, but not a highly-skilled one that can work miracles.” Shen Zechuan seemed to be curious. “How did you find the Venerable Master?”

“Hezhou, of course.” Yan Heru’s expression relaxed. “Your Lordship may not know it, but Hezhou was the Venerable Master’s home as a layman before he became a monk. Ever since I found out Second Master was looking for the Venerable Master, I sent men to keep an eye on his former house. As luck would have it, the Venerable Master really went back. What a pity I didn't make it in time. Had I come a few days earlier, the Venerable Master would have been in Duanzhou by now."

"It wasn't meant to be," Shen Zechuan said. "That can't be helped."

"But I know of some elder imperial physicians in Juexi. They are all masters of their trade, and they used to treat Emperor Guangcheng in the past." Yan Heru picked up the empty cup. "Their reputations are on par with the Venerable Master, and they have also made quite a name in the thirteen cities. Many a number of high-ranking officials and noblemen are all seeking to receive medical treatments from them. If Your Lordship wishes to meet them, I can bring them along next time?"

Unexpectedly, Shen Zechuan picked up the teapot and poured tea for Yan Heru. "The medical fees cost a fortune, don't they?"

"It's not an issue at all if a few ten thousand silvers can make His Lordship happy." Seeing as the tea was about to overflow, Yan Heru raised a hand to stop him. "It makes me happy to spend money as a sign of respect to Your Lordship."

A gush of night breeze leaked its way in from somewhere, sending ripples across the surface of the tea, creasing it.

Holding this position, Yan Heru lowered his voice. "I heard Xi the Second set a trap in Qudu with the intent to surround and kill Your Lordship, but he ended up committing suicide right before Your Lordship's eyes. Tsk, tsk. His blood spilled all over the ground. How very tragic."

Shen Zechuan did not set down the teapot. With a smile, he said, "He who is unrighteous is doomed to bring about their own downfall. I can't stop him even if I wanted to."

"But as I see it," Yan Heru said. "Your Lordship is no man of honor either..." He drawled and chuckled. "I'm already on familiar terms with the Imperial Bodyguards in your residence. Your Lordship, why do you still ask them to surround me?"

The candle flames in the room flickered violently. It was quiet in the courtyard; the guards had all seemed to have disappeared.

Yan Heru retracted his hand. Unafraid, he said, "See, I have never learned martial arts, and I don't even know any fancy strokes for show. So why make a big hoo-ha if you want to kill me? Draw Yang Shan Xue out of its sheath and slash me to get it all done and over with.” At this point, he smacked his thigh and said as though he had just remembered, “Oh, I forgot. Your Lordship can’t hold a blade now. No wonder Second Master is using every means possible to find Yideng, by hook or by crook. How anxiety-inducing it must have been for him.”

This little scumbag.

Fei Sheng, who was crouching in wait on the rooftop, spat soundlessly.

“How could I bear to kill you?” Shen Zechuan set down the teapot.

“Qidong is still counting on you to supply their military provisions after the fourth month, and the expenses for the Liuzhou port are also all borne by you. Without you, who is going to handle affairs on my behalf?”

“I didn’t think Your Lordship would bear to kill me either.” Yan Heru deftly tapped the handle of his chair with his fingers as he shook his leg. “But it can’t be helped, man. You were ripping me off so bad a while back, and now you are staking half of your assets on me. But let me say a word in all honesty, okay? I can’t bear to fall out with Your Lordship either. Where am I going to find such a good-looking and intelligent master like Your Lordship in the future? This whole saga about Yideng really came out of left field to me. If Your Lordship agrees, I’ll give Mister Yuanzhuo more than ten thousand silver as an apology. Would that work? Being happy is what matters most in life. Only then will there be meaning in living.”

Just as it seemed as if the atmosphere in this room was about to ease up, Shen Zechuan unexpectedly changed the topic. “The Venerable Master Yideng died a long time ago, am I right?”

Yan Heru looked abruptly at Shen Zechuan with a smile still on his face. “That can’t...”

“If he were still alive, how could you have been so willing to throw him to me this easily?” Shen Zechuan raised a finger to caress his folding fan and slowly said as he contemplated it over, “The eight cities’ granaries are nothing. Even if I were to take it seriously to heart, I wouldn’t kill you. But it’s hard to say when it comes to the Venerable Master.” Shen Zechuan’s expressive eyes were as dark as ink as he looked at Yan Heru. “Ce’an put in so much effort in an attempt to find the Venerable Master. If he were to really find traces of him only to find out that the Venerable Master had died in your hands, then even the heavenly emperor himself can’t save you even if he were to come and intercede on your behalf. So you have to get rid of this hot potato as soon as possible.”

Yan Heru's trip here this time was to apologize and admit the error of his ways. But what mistake did he have to apologize for? The eight cities' granaries. Qudu's investigation led it to the City of Dancheng, and Xue Yanqing emerged the victor for the time being in that game. Yan Heru had long known that he would definitely be wanted by the imperial court. Thus, he had to feign handing over the Venerable Master Yideng to give the Hezhou yamen an opportunity to chase after them in hot pursuit, so that the chain of events would logically lead to the overturning of the horse carriage.

This was a card Yan Heru had been reluctant to throw out, but he truly had no other better tactics to deploy. He had indeed found the Venerable Master in Hezhou and kept him prisoner in his residence since the beginning of the year. How was he to expect the Venerable Master to really die?! This leverage that could be used to threaten Shen Zechuan instantly turned into a scourge that meant certain death for Yan Heru. Once Xiao Chiye found a trail leading to the Venerable Master, Yan Heru would not even have the chance to deal with him. It was only by facing Shen Zechuan would he be able to use the lure of benefits to get a fighting chance at survival.

"You're so smart." Yan Heru had never been one to be stingy with praises. He clenched his abacus. "But since Your Lordship is willing to sit here and talk to me, that means you're willing to go easy on me and leave me a way out. I've done some calculations on the accounts earlier. The six prefectures of Zhongbo can't afford to supply military provisions to the northern and southern battlefields for an entire year. What's more, Your Lordship still wants to restore the people's livelihood in the six prefectures... I'm not the same as Xi Hongxuan. Your Lordship can't do without me every step of the way."

"You are indeed different from Xi Hongxuan, so why compare yourself to him?" Shen Zechuan found Yan Heru interesting. "You are excessively extravagant in the way you handle matters, and you are all decked out in gold and silver. Your robes have to be embroidered with copper coins and ingots, and your neck has to have a golden abacus hung around it. You can't wait to announce to the entire world that you love money, but do you really love money?"

Xi Hongxuan was also an ostentatious man given to showing off, but never to such an extreme extent. Compared to Yan Heru, Xi Hongxuan was more like a study of a noble clan's descendant. Going by the deposits in both households' money coffers, Xi Hongxuan could even be considered a dutiful son who was frugal. But Yan Heru was just the opposite. All his business transactions required money to be invested first. Rather than say he wanted money, one might as well say he was obsessed with the process of earning money.

With a sudden windfall of profits from the Chazhou grains, the Yan Clan enjoyed a meteoric rise as well. Yan Heru expanded the small mutual trade market in Dunzhou and joined hands with the noble clans to resell public assets. He earned so much money he could not even spend them all in three lifetimes, and he never held back when it came to spending them. Throwing in with Shen Zechuan was an excellent opportunity for him to wash his hands off his former trade. His past deals were all clandestine transactions done under the table. To wash himself clean, he only had to behave himself and supply military provisions and salaries to the northern and southern battlefields, as well as pay his respects to the Prefectural Lord in person from time to time. Once the war was over and Shen Zechuan really made it to the top, no one would be able to lay a hand on him on account of his merit in supplying military grains alone. When the time came, he would metamorphose into an official who had rendered meritorious service.

But Yan Heru was not willing to.

It was precisely because of this restlessness in his bones that he could have the boldness of vision to come up with ideas like building a new port.

It wasn't that this lad was not smart. Like his reputation that preceded him, he was a child prodigy; he was too intelligent, so much so that he was an old hand at exploiting the various tricks in the book. Did he not play the Eight Great Clans for fools too? To date, they were still following behind his arse and picking up money after him. It did not matter if you were a minister in power or a man of ambitions. He was not afraid at all.

Carrying his golden abacus in his arms, Yan Heru curled up in his chair and laughed nonstop with his dimples showing. After he was done laughing, he sighed and said, "Your Lordship, why do you want to be an overlord? Come and do business, man. Then I won't be lonely anymore."

Shen Zechuan sighed too. "I wasn't born at a good time."

Yan Heru tilted his head and said innocently, "Same for me too. If I had been born twenty years earlier, there'd be no room for Xi Hongxuan now."

Fatso is so dumb that he played all the best cards of the Xi clan to ruins.” He raised his chin a little arrogantly. “I see they keep changing the emperor around. If the opportunity were to fall in my hand, I want to swap a few for fun too, man.”

Seeing that Shen Zechuan was not showing any murderous intent, Yan Heru took a sip of tea and continued after hydrating his throat. “Me, I admire Your Lordship so much that it borders on worship, but somehow we are always a little... different. You know my mother? She was a fisherwoman from Hezhou who never had enough to eat at home and still had to raise her good-for-nothing brothers for her parents. Fed up with getting beaten up and scolded, my mother jumped into the water in a fit of pique and ran away. She disguised as a man on a boat for over ten years, going where it went, before moving on to expand her initial tea business in Hezhou with her sworn brothers. Everyone had no family, and so after a discussion, they all decided to simply take on the surname Yan. How nice, right? With money in hand, you can be doing whatever your heart desires.” He laughed again. “The other households took women in as concubines, while my mother went around picking a husband. She loved all the good-looking men in Hezhou, and my father was the most handsome one. But my mother died young, and my father became Master Yan. He did business too, but he was always cowering and was afraid of everything. Heck, he did not even dare to raise his head when he saw the shopkeeper of the Xi clan.”

Yan Heru was literate, and he had also read the books of sages, but the talk of benevolence, righteousness, morals, and virtues in it was but mere rhetoric that had nothing to do with him. Didn’t all those who spoke of benevolence and righteousness die young? In the days to come later, he became more and more certain of one thing, and that was, it did not matter how long he lived, as long as he lived to his heart’s content.

He looked like he was afraid of everyone. Level a blade before him, and he would shiver, yet the businesses he conducted were all deals that those who held blades for real in their hands would not necessarily dare to do.

What kind of money was Zhongbo making? Yan Heru knew it all too well. He saw refugees strewn all over the lands when his horse carriage passed through the territory. How pitiful. But what did all of this have to do with him? He was merely having fun in these turbulent times. If someone really starved to death, it couldn't be pinned on his head; there were many other people standing before him to take the blame.

Where was his fault in this?

Yan Heru leaned over the edge of the table and repeated the question to Shen Zechuan. "Where does my blame lie in this? The military defeat of Zhongbo has nothing to do with me, man. That was all Shen Wei's fault. As for reselling grains... Well, if I don't do it, others will do it. Rather than let other people waste all these silvers, I might as well use it to build a mutual trade market. The money has to be in circulation, see. It's most meaningless to hide them away in the coffers, as the Xi clan did in their money vault."

Shen Zechuan wanted to kill him, so he had the Venerable Master Yideng hidden away. Was he wrong to do so? It just so happened that the Venerable Master did not survive through it.

Yan Heru said, "Given the Venerable Master's lot in life, he will still die once old age catches up with him even if I don't take him in. What's more, he'd die in the middle of nowhere."

Yan Heru was too young. He was, in certain aspects, just as naïve as he looked. It wasn't that he had no one to teach him, but that the people who taught him were all not as intelligent as he was. He called Cai Yu "grandpa". Cai Yu was a bandit in Chazhou, but in his early years, he had also been a righteous man who gave generously to the old and weak, women and children in the territory. In the end, he still did those unconscionable deals against his conscience with Yan Heru.

"The people in this world all like to preach about morality and righteousness, but it's all just talk." Yan Heru jumped off the chair, still hugging his abacus. "Profits come and go. Money is meant to be spent. Spend it, and you have everything. It's true that I don't give a hoot about this, because I earn much, much more. There's no business that I can't have my fun with."

The room was a little quiet. Yan Heru found Shen Zechuan too silent. He deliberated it over and said to Shen Zechuan, "Regarding what happened to the Venerable Master Yideng... since Your Lordship wants to settle the score, then it can't be helped. I made a bad move, so naturally, I'm willing to make up for it. Just go ahead and let me know what medicinal herbs the residence needs. I'll continue to deliver Qidong's military provisions this year, so can we just turn the page on this matter?"

Shen Zechuan looked at him. "You should go back."

Yan Heru remained fixed in place for a moment. As if wanting to explain himself and make it clear to Shen Zechuan, he said again, “The port of Liuzhou is at a critical juncture. Your Lordship, I’ll come to call on you again the day after tomorrow and show you the bylaws.”

Shen Zechuan did not utter a word.

The candle flame in the room was dark and gloomy. Yan Heru unwarrantedly felt a little afraid. This was different from the fear he had felt in the past—it was cool icy fear that seeped deep into his bones. He knew the kind of man Shen Zechuan was. Shen Zechuan would not kill him, because intelligent people would not do so. What he had was confidence.

Yan Heru took a few steps back. When he reached the door, he flashed a smile at Shen Zechuan and turned around to lift the hanging screen before stepping out. A maidservant was waiting under the eaves with a lantern in hand. Yan Heru looked at that deathly white lantern, and his hair stood on end.<sup>43</sup>

The candle flame in the room went out, and it was so quiet in the courtyard that not a sound could be heard.

Yan Heru did not let the maidservant see him out. He grabbed over the lantern and walked down the walkway with increasing speed until he eventually broke into a mad run, as if something was chasing him. Gasping for breath, he ran desperately for all he was worth. At this moment, he had to admit that he was still afraid of death after all!

“I, I have... Qidong’s 800,000 silver...” Yan Heru heard the sound of feet landing on the ground behind him. He looked back in a panic and saw nothing, but still, he cried, like a child who had broken a vase and felt aggrieved at the inconsequential mistake. He yelled, “SHEN ZECHUAN —!”

Shen Zechuan sat in his chair and poured away Yan Heru’s unfinished tea, just like the cup he poured for Xi Hongxuan back then.<sup>44</sup>

The tea leaves lay on the rug, drying up in no time.

CHAPTER 228: IN THE FUTURE

Fei Sheng was quite meticulous in dealing with the aftermath. The guards washed all traces of blood away from the hallway the fastest they could, and the entire affair was over in merely the time it took to finish a cup of tea.<sup>45</sup> When Fei Sheng lifted the hanging screen, he saw the Prefectural Lord dozing off with his eyes closed. He lowered his voice. “Master, it’s been handled.”

Shen Zechuan seemed to be semi-conscious as his half-lidded eyes stared at the candle flame that was about to burn out, giving off an unapproachable aura as he sat there. After a long while, he asked, “Where is Gu Jin?”

Fei Sheng answered, “He should have arrived at Mount Luo by tonight.”

Looking as if he was now awake, Shen Zechuan breathed out a nasal acknowledgment and said, “Tell him to go back.”

Fei Sheng half-kneeled by the entrance with his upper body partially bending over. He paused for a moment, not daring to overdo his words lest it appeared too woeful, so he said, “He has Second Master’s letter with him. Master, Mount Luo is not that far away from Duanzhou. It won’t take much time.”

Shen Zechuan was not in a good mood this night and did not respond. Fei Sheng promptly shut his mouth and wisely took his leave. In the time that it took to burn through two sticks of incense, Qiao Tianya arrived, pushing Yao Wenyu in his wheelchair.

The bamboo blinds opened and closed. Shen Zechuan said, “Why hasn’t Yuanzhuo retired for a rest? It’s already so late.”

Yao Wenyu released his grip on the book he was holding and covered himself properly with the thin blanket. “Without Yan Heru, the shops in Hezhou are going to be thrown into chaos. Since Your Lordship is here alone tonight ruminating over countermeasures to deal with this situation, why not hear out my humble opinion?”

As someone who used to excel at philosophical discourses,<sup>46</sup> Yuanzhuo’s voice was like the murmuring of spring waters—suitably soothing, and extremely pleasant to listen to.

Shen Zechuan inclined his head. “Light the lamps and prepare the tea.”

A maidservant entered the room to remove the tea-stained rug and replaced the lamps, finally brightening up the room’s interior a little. Fei Sheng made a special point of getting the maidservant to brew stronger tea so as to perk up the Prefectural Lord and his advisor.

“Kill Yan Heru, and the shops in Hezhou will be thrown into chaos for a time. Let Yan Heru live, and all the businesses under the sky will be in turmoil for a lifetime.” Shen Zechuan did not drink the tea, instead forcing himself to stay focused. “Moreover, Yan Heru was so certain that I wouldn’t take his life. If I accede to his wishes, there will be no end of trouble in the future.”

Shen Zechuan had no patience for naughty kids. A long time back when Yan Heru brought up the Venerable Master Yideng, Shen Zechuan had already decided his fate. Shen Zechuan could be made a fool of, but he could not be coerced. The truth was that Yan Heru did not understand Shen Zechuan or Xiao Chiye at all. He had not the slightest clue which one of the pair was actually the sheath of the blade.

In addition to this, Xiao Chiye was so anxious to find the Venerable Yideng because he had just been through a parting by death. Shen Zechuan only had to think about how Xiao Chiye would feel after learning of the news, and he had no intent to let Yan Heru live for another second longer.

Yao Wenyu waited for the maidservant to leave before speaking up. “Yan Heru did not bring an entourage along with him this time and left his trusted aides behind in Hezhou, all to inspire fear and misgivings in Your Lordship.”

It was as Yan Heru had said. He did not even know any fancy martial arts strokes for show. He dared to take it a step further and strut into the inner chamber to threaten Shen Zechuan because he was confident of success. He left his trusted aides in Hezhou. If he did not make it back home as scheduled, the Yan clan would choke off the bottom end of the trade route between Huaizhou, Cizhou, and Chazhou and refuse access to the merchants of Zhongbo. This would force Shen Zechuan into having no choice but to go past Huaizhou, take a detour over to the vicinity of Dicheng, and pass through the Port of Yongyi to finally make it deep into Juexi. This route was not only a toll on time and energy; they also had to go to painstaking efforts to deal with the checkpoints along the way. Even the slightest slip-up could set them up for failure.

“All the merchants in the world are in it for profit,” Shen Zechuan said. “Zhongbo is the key transit point for both Libei and Qidong. What the Yan Clan choked off will not be just my trade route, but also that of the merchants who have already invested in it. These people have all now tasted the finer delicacies. Tell them to return to consuming edible wild herbs and vegetables, and no matter how it tastes, their unsatiated stomachs will not agree.”

Shen Zechuan was unlike the bandits Yan Heru had encountered. He had legitimate power in hand in the east, and it was something that neither Cai Yu, Lei Jingzhe, and the likes could hold a candle to. He could finalize the tariffs in both regions in the east, and he held a vice grip on the three strategic points of Luoxia pass, the mutual trade market, as well as Dengzhou. Even if Yan Heru wanted to rely solely on business to coerce him, it also depended on whether or not Shen Zechuan was willing to play along.

The Zhongbo garrison troops were in severe need of large amounts of military armament this year, and it was impossible for Shen Zechuan to produce them himself. The copper mines were all in the west. Those merchants who had been stealthily scalping copper meant for governmental use still had last-year stock in hand, and they were now all burning with anxiety and desperation to hop onto the ship that was Zhongbo. There was no need for the Prefectural Lord to go knocking on their doors. As long as His Lordship said the word, these people would be willing to make the long journey over to sell their stocks. It had to be known that Liang Cuishan and Jiang Qingshan were currently conducting strict checks on the goods passing through. If the copper for governmental use still being hidden in these merchant's warehouses were to be exposed, they would be as good as dead. The only person in the world who could swallow up this volume of stocks in one go was Shen Zechuan.

As for the Qidong's military provisions, Shen Zechuan was not worried either.

Initially, when Shen Zechuan took over the Xi clan's shops, he had gone to quite the effort, counting on Xi Dan and Ge Qingqing. As the Xi clan was a noble clan that was particular about the bequest of its inheritance only to those of their surname, he spared the life of the Eldest Madam Xi. But this was not the case for the Yan clan, who had established themselves through the tea trade and consisted of a den of sworn brothers from the martial arts fraternity. There might have been sentimental ties during Yan Heru's mother's generation, but when it came to Yan Heru's time, it was the capable ones who ruled the roost. Without Yan Heru in the picture, the brothers at sixes and sevens beneath him would all be willing to negotiate with the Prefectural Lord. Shen Zechuan did not even need to say a word about the Qidong military provisions, and he would still have people to provide the supplies for him.

Yan Heru was important, but he was nowhere near as significant as he thought himself out to be.

"The port in Liuzhou is under the sole charge of Yan Heru," Yao Wenyu said, "the details of which we are indeed unclear about. However, there's still Xi Dan in Juexi to manage the businesses on Your Lordship's behalf. Get him to assign a few men over to take charge. There's no need to be too overly concerned. What is of utmost urgency at present is the substantial amount of silver required for the construction of the port. I'm afraid it will prove difficult to proceed if the cost is solely borne by Zhongbo."

Shen Zechuan asked in response, "What Yuanzhuo means is...?"

"Your Lordship has to return to Qudu eventually. By then, all the merchants in the world will still be Your Lordship's merchant." Yao Wenyu took a moment to catch a breather, continuing only after his cough subsided. "The business deals that will be conducted upon the completion of the port will profit everyone. So why not Your Lordship let the merchants fork out this sum of money to finance the port—let them have the honor of doing the favor and claim a stake in it at the same time? Your Lordship only needs to open up Liuzhou in the future and adjust the tariffs accordingly, and these people will be the treasury of the new dynasty, as well as the coffer of Your Lordship."

And that was not all. Yan Heru's idea of building a new port in Liuzhou was a brilliant one. The bay could accommodate a sizable number of ships, and the revival of Liuzhou and the towns in its vicinity was right on the horizon; this was a fertile field that was on the point of being reclaimed and put under the plow. As long as these merchants were not muddleheaded fools, they would be unequivocally happy to throw in with Shen Zechuan and get a share of the pie here.

Yao Wenyu could even imagine that when that day came, the malady that was the noble clan would have been eradicated, and the nation would begin its recuperation and rehabilitation. Liuzhou would become Shen Zechuan's largest port linking up the southeast, and even the first major port to connect to the rest of the world. That would be the day...

Yao Wenyu suddenly covered his mouth and started to cough violently. In his haste, he knocked over the teacup, and piping hot tea sloshed and splashed onto his thin blanket, soaking both of his legs.

Shen Zechuan had already risen to his feet. He caught the teacup and bent over to call out, "Yuanzhuo..."

Yao Wenyu did not finish his sentence. He had so many words left unspoken in his chest, but they were all choked off by his coughs. As he covered his mouth and nose, he raised a hand to signal that he was fine.

"Fei Sheng!" Shen Zechuan saw blood seeping through Yao Wenyu's sleeve and immediately barked, "Summon the physician!"

Outside, Fei Sheng acknowledged his order and turned around to shout for someone. The instant Qiao Tianya heard the crash, he felt an ill sense of foreboding. Without even waiting for Shen Zechuan to call for him, he lifted the hanging screen and entered.

CHAPTER 229: PAN LIN

Gu Jin received the letter from Duanzhou when he was at Mount Luo. At that time, he was just about to get on his horse to continue on his way. With a complicated expression after reading the letter, he turned to look at Huo Lingyun, who was on his way to transfer horses, “Is this the letter His Lordship wrote just before you set off?”

Pulling his own horse, Huo Lingyun gave a nod of his head and unscrewed the water canteen to take a swig. “It was written just last night.”

Gu Jin kept the letter away in his bosom and took out another one to hand to Huo Lingyun. “This is from Second Master to His Lordship... What exactly did the Imperial Bodyguard who went to examine the horse carriage say?”

“That the Hezhou yamen was in such hot pursuit that it forced the carriage driver into a desperate corner, and as he drove along the bridle path that had fallen into disrepair, it plunged into the stream.” Huo Lingyun hung the water canteen back and carefully kept away Xiao Chiye’s letter in his bosom. “A few men went down to the stream and checked for four hours. No survivors.”

Gi Jin’s expression gradually darkened. He had come over on orders to watch over the Venerable Master Yideng on Xiao Chiye’s behalf, but he did not expect the Venerable Master to be gone just like that. Gu Jin stood rooted in place, feeling perplexed as he muttered to himself, “What is the Venerable Master doing in Hezhou?”

“Isn’t that where his home was as a layman?” Having ridden for an entire night, Huo Lingyun was now reeking of sweat all over. “Going by what Yan Heru said, the Venerable Master died of illness. If he did not expect to live long, he would have returned home to see his family.”

“The Venerable Master cut ties with the secular world when he left home to become a monk, and the ones still left in his family are all collateral relatives, not his kin brothers.” At this point, Gu Jin thought of Dajing. He continued, “Besides, the Venerable Master agreed to return to Dajing this year. If he didn’t expect to live long, he would have fulfilled his promise first.”

Huo Lingyun never had any interactions with the Venerable Master Yideng before. Seeing the sun rising, he said, “I’ve rested enough. It’s time for me to hit the road.”

Gu Jin led his horse aside a little to give way. After turning his horse around, Huo Lingyun said to Gu Jin, “When you reach the battle zone, remember to tell Second Master that Tantai Hu wants to try out his new blades too.”

Gu Jin did not answer him, but said, “Tell Laohu to write a letter to Second Master himself. I’m not returning.” He scuffed the mud off the soles of his boots, flipped onto his horse, and pointed in the other direction with his horsewhip. “I’m going to make a trip to Hezhou.”

Physicians crowded under the eaves, silent as cicadas in winter, not daring to make a racket. Seeing as this was not the place for discussion, Fei Sheng hurriedly arranged for the physicians to head over next door.

Kong Ling did not enter to disturb Yuanzhuo’s rest, but followed behind Fei Sheng and asked, “What did the physicians say?”

Fei Sheng cast a glance at the still bamboo blinds, and lifted an arm to guide Kong Ling to the side. He whispered, “They are all afraid. Their prescriptions can’t be compared to the ones our Imperial Bodyguards prescribed. None of them dare to go too heavy on the potency and dosage of the medicine.”

Kong Ling might have been widely read, but he indeed was not well-versed in the art of medicine. He remained still for a moment with a slightly stunned expression. “Then...”

Fei Sheng could not say for sure either. Before, everyone had their hopes pinned on the Venerable Master Yideng, and this one move of Yan

Heru caught all of them off guard. He avoided the newly sprouted branches and merely said, "His Lordship wrote a letter to Ge Qingqing last night to get them to search for physicians in the thirteen cities of Juexi. They will be able to arrive in Duanzhou after the sixth month."

But how were they to survive through these three months?

Fei Sheng did not dare to speak irresponsibly. He was on tenterhooks too, seeing the physicians coming and going last night. Yao Wenyu typically pushed himself to hang in there. Earlier in Cizhou, he had drained his energy to placate the scholars who had come to throw in with Shen Zechuan. At the same time, he also held discussions with Kong Ling and the rest for nights on end to settle arrangements for the six prefectures' yamen. Then he traveled from Cizhou to Duanzhou. In fact, his illness had never taken a turn for the better since his arrival in Duanzhou.

Kong Ling stood for a moment before saying gravely, "Wait for a moment. I'll update His Lordship. His Lordship has not slept for a night, and he's still waiting in the hall for news."

"Then you have to persuade my master too." Fei Sheng was shaken by the sight of Yao Wenyu coughing up blood. He chased a few steps after Kong Ling. "I heard yesterday that the Venerable Master is gone. Master seems to be in rather low spirits, on top of his worries of Advisor Yuanzhuo. Mind that he doesn't fall sick. There's Qiao Tianya and I to keep watch here; nothing serious will happen."

Kong Ling hurriedly answered in the affirmative and lifted the hem of his robe to leave the courtyard. When he arrived at Shen Zechuan's courtyard, he saw the Prefectural Lord standing under the eaves listening to Ding Tao.

On seeing Kong Ling, Shen Zechuan gestured to Ding Tao with a nod of his head to stop for a moment. Ever since that incident in Dunzhou, Ding Tao had been very well-behaved. He promptly shut up and retreated to the side to make way for Kong Ling.

Kong Ling deliberated over his words. "He has just fallen asleep, and they are now decocting the medicine in his courtyard. Qiao Tianya is keeping watch at the side, so there's no need for Your Lordship to be too worried."

It was peaceful and quiet in the courtyard. Shen Zechuan came down the steps and asked, "None of the physicians gave a definite answer?"

Kong Ling noted Shen Zechuan's displeased expression and followed at his side. "These physicians are all from the countryside. They have never seen a figure like Yuanzhuo, so naturally, they do not dare to fool us with common prescriptions. They are also very cautious in their speech, but they are all willing to do their best. No one dares to be sloppy."

Being the astute man he was, Shen Zechuan knew on hearing Kong Ling's words that no one among this group of physicians could treat and cure Yuanzhuo. All they dared to do was to nurse him with rest and nourishment, and try their best to avoid risks.

"Send another urgent letter to Yu Xiaozai." Shen Zechuan stopped in his tracks. "Tell him to keep an eye out for the physicians in the various prefectures when he's on his inspection rounds. Send all the ones he can find to Duanzhou. Take the physicians' fees from my private coffer. Give whatever is needed."

Kong Ling stopped too. He saw the guard on the other end come over to hand over the letter and made no further sound to disrupt Shen Zechuan from reading his letter.

Shen Zechuan turned over the letter and saw Ge Qingqing's personal seal on it. He opened it to read, after which he handed it to Kong Ling and said, "The war in Qudu is over."

Kong Ling read it at the side for a moment. "At present, Commander-in-chief Qi does not lack military provisions. What she lacks is a noble rank and title. The Empress Dowager clearly realizes this, yet she still wants to stubbornly persist in coercing her. She ends up giving Xue Yanqing a helping hand instead."

"She who rides a tiger finds it difficult to dismount—she has no other way to back down," Shen Zechuan said. "Deep down, she wants to use Qi Zhuyin, but she indeed has no more bargaining chips to take out. If they were really to come to blows, no one could beat Han Cheng's 20,000 capital troops."

What Shen Zechuan had spoken of at the beginning of "befriending a distant state while attacking one nearby"<sup>47</sup> had long taken an about-turn. Qudu's fatigue was evident. To the east where they faced Zhongbo and Libei, they only had the Eight Great Training Division to send reinforcements in an emergency, and with the issue of the commoners' fields in the City of Dancheng blown up to such proportions, they had no military defenses to speak of. Qi Zhuyin herself was the last straw Qudu had to clutch at.

Kong Ling slightly sucked in a breath when he reached the end of the letter. "Pan Xiangjie and Pan Lin are dead."

"The Empress Dowager's current adversary is Xue Xiuzhuo." Shen Zechuan looked at the overcast firmament of heaven, which looked like it was about to rain. "So how could she escape unscathed?"

Rain was falling in Qudu; this was the beginning of the rainy season.

The Grand Secretariat wanted to hold Han Cheng accountable. Han Cheng kept to his narrative that the officials the Eight Great Training Divisions killed in the prisons were all spies from Zhongbo. Both sides launched into a war of words on the imperial court, and it was at this time news of Pan Xiangjie's death was reported.

It was then Liang Cuishan recalled no one paid Pan Xiangjie any heed when he cried for help that day while locked up in the innermost part of the prison. Everyone had been at daggers drawn with one another at that time, and Pan Xiangjie had suffocated to death from the smoke in his cell. It was only when the wardens were cleaning up the cells that his death was discovered.

"Pan Lin was the one who spilled the beans on the granaries." Xue Xiuzhuo spoke up in Mingli Hall. "He was also the one who turned over the Ministry of Revenue's current detailed accounts. This man's crime is not so heinous as to deserve death."

Cen Yu found what happened to Pan Lin regrettable; thus, he nodded. "That's not to say he should be exonerated. Justice cannot be tampered with, but can be tempered with mercy. He still has to be punished, for the law cannot be violated, but discretion can be exercised in light of the circumstances."

Kong Qiu pondered it over for a moment and looked over the confession statement presented by the Ministry of Justice. "Although Pan Lin confessed, it was only after the imperial court began pursuing the matter. He was already an accessory to crime since the day issues started cropping up in the accounts a long time back. He can be spared the death penalty, but not punishment."

In the end, the Grand Secretariat decided to dismiss Pan Lin from his position, demote his status, and exile him to Huaizhou. But as the Dancheng case was temporarily still unresolved, Pan Lin had to remain at the relay station and wait to be summoned.

Unlike the descendants from Pan Xiangjie's generation, Pan Lin studied to be an official and saw himself as a scholar. He was a little arrogant, so he did not get along with Xue the Eldest and the others. But now, he was reduced from being the young master of a noble clan to a commoner guilty of a crime, and he had also lost his father to death. This abrupt change in his family circumstances compounded his plight in the relay station, where he was given the cold shoulder treatment and handed only cold leftovers for his meals.

Xue the Eldest once had a verbal dispute with Pan Lin during the banquet celebrating Xiao Chiye's conferment, but in the spirit of visiting, he made a special point of bringing along delicacies to see Pan Lin, hoping to bury the hatchet with the latter before they parted.

The errand-runner at the relay station led Xue the Eldest in. Seeing the narrow and cramped room, he asked the errand-runner, "Is this where Pan Chengzhi is staying? He's the legitimate young master of the Pan clan and the Vice Minister of the Ministry of Revenue... How can you people let him live here?"

The errand-runner opened the door with the key and slickly said, "Wasn't the properties of the Pan clan seized and confiscated? He's a criminal, and this is the arrangement made by the imperial court, so how would us small potatoes dare to defy?" He pushed the door open and instructed, "My lord, please don't stay for too long. We will be held accountable if the Ministry of Justice were to get wind of this!"

Xue the Eldest's skinny and wizened body hunched over as he craned his neck to look in from the side of the door. He saw Pan Lin sitting by the window. This room was extremely dark, and it was leaking rain everywhere; even the floor was soaked through.

Pan Lin's robe was damp, as were his boots. He was still wearing the same clothes as he did in prison, and he had some stubble on his face. He looked much too haggard.

Xue the Eldest strode through the door carrying the food container<sup>48</sup> in hand and called out in a soft voice, "Chengzhi... I'm here to see you."

Pan Lin turned his eyes and looked at him for a long while before he said, "Have a seat."

Xue the Eldest set the food container on the table and sat near the chair. He surveyed the surroundings. "At the very least, you are... I'll go and talk to them later. Even a change to another room is fine too."

Pan Lin's eyes reddened. He cut a forlorn sight as he sat all drenched under the rain that was leaking in.

Xue the Eldest fidgeted and shifted a little. Before things got too awkward, he took the initiative and said, "I'm not here today to... to mock you. You're going to Huaizhou, and it's so far away. Once we part... we won't see each other again in the future. I wanted to see you off..."

Pan Lin remained unmoved.

For some reason, Xue the Eldest was gripped by a feeling of sadness. He was of legitimate birth, as was Pan Lin. But how could lawful sons of legitimate birth like them end up in such a state? With tears in his eyes, he hesitated for a long time before continuing, "Chengzhi... About what happened during the Marquis' banquet last year to celebrate his conferment... I'm sorry. I heard you let Yuanzhuo go, and I... I'm very impressed. You have talents, but your family brought this all on you. The Senior Grand Secretary is willing to exempt you from the death penalty because he treasures talents. Once you arrive in Huaizhou, you'll still have the chance to show your mettle again..."

But even Xue Xiuyi himself did not believe these words of his. They were all men who depended on their clans for survival. With this big of a mess the field taxes had created, Pan Lin would be reviled by all and used as a doormat once he arrived in Huaizhou.

After a moment of silence, Pan Lin spoke up, "Pingjing."

Xue Xiuyi's courtesy name was Pingjing. Like Xue Xiuzhuo's Yanqing, they were all given by Old Master Xue. He hurriedly responded with an "ay".

"Back then, when I assumed the post as the Vice Minister of the Ministry of Revenue and had the account books in hand, I hesitated for a long time, but in the end, I did not hand them over to Secretariat Elder Hai. I played jackal to the tiger and abetted the villains, bringing untold sufferings onto the common folks of the eight cities. My death is not to be regretted, and there's nothing for me to explain to vindicate myself. The storm in Qudu has been ongoing for many years, and now that there is Xue Yanqing," Pan Lin looked at Xue Xiuyi, as if he was looking at his own self who still had a chance many years ago, “the glory of the Eight Cities has come to an end.”

Xue the Eldest heard a deafening crash of thunderbolt that lit up Qudu for an instant. He thought Pan Lin would give him some heartfelt advice, but Pan Lin eventually said, “I think you should go.”

Xue Pingjing pushed the food container over to Pan Lin. “I brought you some food...” He fell silent too and sat here until the rain gradually grew heavier and the errand-runner outside came a few times to hurry him up.

When Xue Pingjing rose to his feet, his robe was wet too. He bowed in farewell to Pan Lin. Pan Lin stood up, straightened his clothes, and returned the bow.

Xue Pingjing did not dare to look any further and turned around to leave. In that corridor, he could not tell which way was out.

Pan Lin listened to the receding sound of footsteps and sat back down at the table. Through it all, he never touched the food container Xue Pingjing brought. He took up his brush and neatly wrote the words “Statement of Guilt”.

This letter was not for the imperial court, but for Pan Xiangjie. It was the bidding of farewell between father and son. Pan Lin wrote a very long letter, as if he did not know how to face his father. He wept when he put his brush down, and then he cleaned himself up and lay down on the tattered mat with his clothes in order.

He never opened his eyes again.

CHAPTER 230: SPRING

Qiao Tianya leaned back into the rattan chair, biting down on a red thread between his lips as he deftly braided it with his fingers. Moonlight – thin during the hour of chou – streaked across the side of the bridge of his nose, making his lidded eyes appear rather lonely.

The seven-stringed zither rested on the table, covered with silk. It had not been touched in days.

Yao Wenyu did not make a sound when he woke up. He turned his head aside to look at Qiao Tianya.

Qiao Tianya was like the solitary, lonesome moon that had come to a standstill between the deep valley after a sudden rainstorm—limpid and faraway. That unbridled wind turned into an old dream of last night, leaving a ghost of a shadow on him. Yao Wenyu still kept that colored silk ball of that day, but he had long come to understand that he could never walk over to his side.

This was the first march of spring, one that came to nothing in its passing.

Qiao Tianya took off the red thread and finished up the tail end beautifully. He reached out for Yao Wenyu's hand and put the braided red thread on Yao Wenyu's wrist.

Hidden behind the lowered drapes, Yuanzhuo peeked through the gap at this person who was well within his reach. Soundlessly, he started to laugh, but gradually, the side of his pillow grew damp.

Qiao Tianya did not lift the hanging drapes open. They relied on merely their fingers to convey the warmth between them, as though this was the closest they could ever get to intimacy; any closer, and it would all vanish.

Throughout it all, Yao Wenyu never spoke a word. It was as if he had never woken up at all.

When Shen Zechuan came the next day, Yao Wenyu was already up. He bent slightly towards Shen Zechuan in what could be considered a bow.

“My illness flared suddenly yesterday and held up official business.” Yao Wenyu lowered his fingers to pick up the cluttered mess of chess pieces. “So I should finish saying my piece while I’m still feeling up to it today.”

Shen Zechuan took his seat. “Your illness is only starting to show improvement. It’s fine for you to rest for half a month first before discussing it.”

“Idling while sick is still idling; I have nothing to do anyway.” Yao Wenyu contemplated it for a few moments. “The port of Liuzhou is, in fact, a matter of priority. Having this place may be likened to having a place in Juexi to talk.”

What Yao Wenyu was thinking about was different from Kong Ling and the rest. He was much more far-sighted, and in this current mutually antagonistic situation, he was more inclined to take in virtuous talents for Shen Zechuan than to kill off every single one of Dazhou officials.

“You think you lack generals, but in my view, it’s just the opposite.” Yao Wenyu put the chess pieces in place. “Valiant generals are just what the three lands in the east won’t lack most in the future. Be it Wu Ziyu or Tantai Hu; they are all capable of assuming sole responsibility and taking complete charge. Your Lordship has nothing to worry about over the territories in the east with them stationed at the frontiers once the war subsides. What Your Lordship lacks are capable ministers and officials. Although Chengfeng is decent, he isn’t willing to leave Zhongbo, and while Zhou Gui is loyal, he isn’t up to taking on great responsibilities. On the other hand, Juexi has gone through several years without falling into the noble clans’ hands, and that is precisely because this place has a capable minister—Jiang Qingshan.”

“The real reason Xue Yanqing could stir up a storm in the imperial court is because of the people from the practical doers’ faction who support him; the Heir Apparent is only an opportunity. These people are not of high ranks, but they are the key that decides whether the reforms can be pushed through. They work for the good of the people in Juexi, wanting to revitalize the Li clan's empire and bring about the resurgence during the reign of Yongyi again. They are scholars with far more boldness of vision than the officials in the capital, and they are also the last worthy officials of Dazhou."

Being enthroned as the supreme ruler was no easy feat. A change of dynasty and government meant that innumerable scholars had to sever their dreams of the past. The state of affairs in the imperial court had already degenerated to such an extent, but Hai Liangyi and Xue Xiuzhuo had never once harbored the idea of replacing the Li clan. This was because doing so was comparable to the crime of patricide. Under the principles of social order constituting the cardinal relationships between the ruler and his subjects and the father and his sons,<sup>49</sup> the Li clan was and had been the Son of Heaven for centuries. This not only represented the need to shout "long live your majesty" as per the code of ethics, but also symbolized generations of people following a legitimate lineage of descendants.

If Shen Zechuan set foot into Qudu again, then what the "Prefectural Lord" would be defeating was the legitimate Son of Heaven that towered tall and majestic over them all. He had to obtain the Heaven-bestowed right to kill the sovereign before he could strip himself of the "treacherous traitor" label. Yet, this was far from enough. He must employ a suitable way to make the surviving officials of the Li clan put themselves at his disposal willingly. Otherwise, even if he won over the empire, he would not be able to achieve the flourishing era of prosperity that Qi Huilian had once spoken of.

"Xue Yanqing's cleaning up of the eight cities' field taxes was originally a good thing, but he was too hasty in going about it. A significant portion of Qudu's taxes now is all tied up in the eight cities' field taxes. Now that he has decisively removed the Pan clan of Dancheng, he has two routes to take. The first one is to push on and continue to investigate the remaining seven cities and resurvey the lands as fast as he can, and the second one is to slow down and give the remaining seven cities a chance to pay the overdue taxes. In the former option, the fields have to be returned to the commoners, but the commoners of the eight cities have long left their homes to make the long journey to Zhongbo. If he re-records the households in the census registers, he will hold up the plowing this year. When that happens, the issue of keeping the common folk fed in three lands of Dazhou after autumn will fall to Juexi and Hezhou to resolve. In the latter option, the field tax deficits will be apportioned between the eight cities, and the eight cities will naturally continue to split the amount between the commoners. A cruel regime that oppresses and exploits its people causes more distress and pangs than tigers with their ferocious claws and fangs. So it's really no different from before."

"By the time Juexi gets tired of the requisitions, the commoners of the thirteen cities would have barely enough to fill their stomachs. If Your Lordship uses the port of Liuzhou as an opportunity to build an east-west waterway and link up to the north-south bridle path, Hezhou and Zhongbo would be able to alleviate Juexi's burden."

By the time Yao Wenyu spoke to this point, the area under the eaves was already bathed in sunlight. Holding a chess piece between his fingers, he took a breather before continuing, "Your Lordship presumably has a plan in mind long before you killed and removed Yan Heru from the equation."

"Hezhou is close to Qidong." Shen Zechuan set down a chess piece after Yao Wenyu. "If I can't get my hands on this land, I won't be able to sleep at night."

All Yan Heru thought about was business, but Shen Zechuan had far more than business on his mind. Qi Zhuyin joined forces with Xue Xiuzhuo in the Dancheng case, which meant that the Heir Apparent would be bestowing a noble title upon her. In that case, she would be a marquis of Dazhou in the future. The Garrison Troops of the Five Commanderies of Qidong were right to the south of Zhongbo. Shen Zechuan must choke off the key supply route of Qidong to the west, of which Hezhou was a necessary route they had to pass through.

Shen Zechuan was blunt with his words. If Qi Zhuyin were to go all out to protect the Li clan, then Dengzhou of Zhongbo would be Shen Zechuan's weakest link. He had to seize control of Hezhou, which was even more important to Qidong. Only then would he be able to sit at the same table and on equal footing with Qi Zhuyin at all times.

"Qi Shiyu is already advanced in age, and Qi Zhuyin is a far more suitable candidate than anyone else to be the Commander-in-chief." Shen Zechuan continued. "Lu Guangbai remains in Libei because he no longer wants to be a general of Dazhou, and Qi Zhuyin has to mend the gap left in Qidong by the Bianjun Commandery herself. Qudu wants her to become a soldier who protects the emperor, but even so, she has to be able to run over.”

Perhaps Qi Zhuyin could really run her way over. That was why Shen Zechuan choked off the roads too.

“Commander-in-chief Qi has been in a predicament over money in recent years. Her willingness to mobilize troops against the Qingshu Tribe was because she was assessing the situation too.” Yao Wenyu started to cough softly.

Shen Zechuan thus stopped bringing up official affairs and merely said, “Qiao Tianya now has to govern the Imperial Cavalry, and he’s at the military drill grounds during the day, so negligence on his part is inevitable. I’ll write a letter to shifu and ask him to come over to Duanzhou to take care of you.”

Yao Wenyu did not refuse. He wiped his mouth with his handkerchief and said, “It’s so far away. I shall have to impose on shifu to make the trip over.”

Shen Zechuan saw the red thread on Yuanzhuo’s wrist, which was concealed by his sleeve when he raised his hand. He did not ask about it and saw Hunu, which had just woken up, brushing against the door as it made its way over.

“Qudu is your old home,” Shen Zechuan said. “I heard Xi Hongxuan say before that you always return to the capital in spring every year. Next year... or perhaps a few years later, you will be able to take a good look at the springtime scenery.”

Yao Wenyu knew Shen Zechuan was comforting him. He flashed a slight smile and did not answer him, but said, “Since the case of Dancheng is coming to a close, where is Pan Lin going to be exiled to?”

Shen Zechuan lowered his folding fan to block Hunu. “Kong Qiu meant to exile him to Huaizhou, but he went on a hunger strike at the Qudu relay station and starved himself to death.”

Yao Wenyu sat in silence for a long time.

Pan Lin achieved success young, and his career as an official was smooth-sailing. The remarks he made to Xue Xiuyi back then during the feast to celebrate Xiao Chiye’s conferment turned out to be prophetic after all, and he ended up dying of starvation. Encumbered by his lineage, he was now finally free.

Qudu was his former home.

Yao Wenyu shifted his eyes to look at the courtyard.
But there were no longer any sights worth going back for.

CHAPTER 231: FEIGNS

At the time Pan Lin died, Li Jianting pulled through. The maids and eunuchs serving in her palace barely had time to weep for joy when they were taken into prison. The Heir Apparent was poisoned, so the Condiment Service<sup>50</sup> was promptly sealed off, while all the eunuchs on duty were imprisoned. Fuman, given his experience during the reign of Emperor Tianchen, took charge of this case and put them through heavy torture.

“Zuzong!” The junior eunuch could not stand the severe beating and cried out as he sprawled over the bench. “Please have mercy!”

Dressed in a python-patterned yisan robe<sup>51</sup> and yandun hat<sup>52</sup>, Fuman stood with his hands on his back while he scrutinized the calligraphy on the wall.

The eunuchs with the flogging paddles were all leftover members from the Eastern Depot. Skilled in the art of torture, they flogged the palace eunuch until he almost fainted.

“Please spare my life...” This junior eunuch choked with sobs.

Fuman turned his head back. “The Heir Apparent was poisoned while you people were serving her. If you want to live, you have to give me a clear account of what happened.”

These inner palace eunuchs entered the palace after Emperor Tianchen. To date, they still did not know what the Heir Apparent was poisoned with, so there was nothing at all they could account for.

Fuman patiently said, “Think about what the Heir Apparent ate or wore that day. There are so many people in the Condiment Service, so perhaps a couple with ulterior motives sneaked their way in. All of you have close contacts with them, so why can't you think of any now?"

The eunuch caught the hint in his words, but he dared not be so presumptuous as to speculate, so he hemmed and hawed without saying a word still.

Fuman flung his sleeve, as if exasperated with the eunuch for failing to come through, and had the old eunuch with the paddle continue with his flogging. The beating was so brutal that blood saturated the eunuch's mouth. Digging his fingers into the bench, he whimpered and sobbed, "Stop, stop it! I'll tell you!"

Fuman paid no attention to him.

The eunuch gulped down the blood froth. "That Condiment Service... and that Garden Service<sup>53</sup>... all had new faces I don't recognize..."

Only then did Fuman turn to the side and coax him softly, "You have contacts with them?"

The eunuch shook his head hard, not daring to answer this question. He raised his eyes tentatively to get a feel of Fuman's expression and sobbed in a small voice, "I don't recognize them."

"If you don't recognize them, how do you know which services they belong to?" Fuman intentionally guided him. "Someone must have told you, and that was how you knew."

The eunuch answered, "The one who, who stands guard at the door to the palace..."

"Tch," Fuman bent down. "Can someone who stands guard at the door get close to the Heir Apparent? Whoever serves the Heir Apparent is usually the one who knows it best."

The eunuch did not dare to breathe heavily as he followed along and answered, "Fengquan is usually the one serving her..."

Fuman clapped his hands lightly at him and said, "There you go. Easy, isn't it."

With the case in Fuman's hands, the chances of identifying the real culprit were zero. He had planted his men in Li Jianting's palace at Han Cheng's instigation. The poison had nothing to do with the Condiments Service. The problem lay in the chopsticks Li Jianting used for her meal that day. Chaos had broken out in the palace when the Heir Apparent collapsed, and Fuman had long gotten someone to steal and replace the original chopsticks to clean up the traces.

Fuman stepped out of the hall, but before he could walk out of the courtyard, he saw several sedan-bearers standing outside under the Chinese scholar tree waiting for him. The supervising officials from the Ministry of Justice had just left, so Fuman was on guard as he lifted the hem of his robe and strode out with a smiling face. “Who is this distinguished person looking for me? You just need to send me a message; there’s no need to go to the extent of coming over to invite me! Coincidentally, I have a case to attend to now and can’t get away...”

The curtain opened, and Han Cheng sneered. “It has been a few days since I last saw you, and you son of a bitch has started to put on airs in imitation of your ‘grandfather’. What? I’m not worthy enough to invite you now?!”

This motherfucker again!

Fuman obediently bent at the waist. “This humble slave thought it was those old fogeys from the Grand Secretariat who keep sticking to me like glue<sup>54</sup> while I’m investigating the case. I was just feeling vexed over it and never expected it to be you. Look at what you are saying. When this humble slave sees you, it’s like, what do you call it? Oh, a baby sparrow seeking refuge in the woods!”<sup>55</sup>

He played dumb, knowing Han Cheng was a sucker for this.

Sure enough, Han Cheng’s expression brightened a little. Not dwelling any further on the matter, he threw down the curtain and commanded, “Follow.”

For the entire journey, Fuman cursed as he walked, keeping it all pent up in his heart. When he arrived at the place and saw that it was Han Cheng’s private residence, he knew the latter was certain to ask him about the Heir Apparent’s case. He stepped through the door, but before he could start toadying up to Han Cheng, he saw the gleaming blades inside. He immediately forgot what he was going to say and fell to his knees with a “thud”.

“Look at how cowardly you are,” Han Cheng lifted the teapot to pour tea without telling Fuman to get up, “and you still want to imitate Pan Rugui? Are you even worthy?!”

“No, definitely not worthy!” Bracing himself against the ground, Fuman forced an apologetic smile. “This humble slave is just a lowly slave.

How could I be compared to the lao-zuzong? I wouldn't dare to harbor such intent."

Han Cheng set the teapot back. "I told you to poison Li Jianting. What poison did you give her?"

Fuman's back was drenched in a cold sweat. He must not hesitate, so he recited what he had rehearsed to himself countless of times, "This slave did as Commander Han said and gave her 'deathchase'."

"That's strange." Han Cheng said mockingly. "This drug can poison several strong men to death, yet it can't kill one woman?"

Fuman felt the chill at the back of his neck. Those were real blades, and they were already pressing in close to him. The muscles on his face twitched, and he suddenly lifted a hand to slap himself. With a change in expression, he cried, "You're hurting my feelings with those words! How would I dare to plot with outsiders to harm my own 'father'? Besides, Xue Yanqing, Kong Qiu, and the few of them detest eunuchs and order me around like I'm livestock. This slave really did put in 'deathchase'. I still have the chopsticks. I wouldn't dare to be sloppy."

Midway through crying, Fuman wiped his tears.

"I'm puzzled too. It's really mind-boggling. That was 'deathchase', but the Heir Apparent unexpectedly got better after puking a few times. If that's not absurd, I don't know what is!"

Han Cheng was livid. Li Jianting's fate – whether she lived or died – determined the direction in which the situation would develop. He even brought out the Eight Great Training Divisions on the gamble that the Heir Apparent would die, but who would have expected Li Jianting to be fine. The fact that the Dancheng case still had yet to reach a conclusion meant that they intended to continue with the investigation. Without the Pan clan, the next one to be targeted would be the Marquis of Helian's Fei clan. Everyone from the seven cities was at risk.

"Have you mentioned the poisoning to anyone else?"

Fuman hurriedly answered, "How would this slave dare?!"

"You'd better not!" Han Cheng suddenly flung away the teacup in his hand. "You're the one who botched this, so you have to clean it up now! All those people in her palace can't be kept alive. Take this opportunity to kill them all."

If Li Jianting was poisoned with "deathchase", she would die for certain. So either someone had swapped out the poison midway, or Fuman did not poison her with “deathchase” at all. No matter what, those people serving her in her bedchamber could not be kept around any longer. It was very possible some other people had slipped their way in.

The eunuchs were a crafty lot. These despicable castrated bunches were best at trimming their sails and going where the winds blew. Fuman was no one decent either. Now that the noble clans had taken a hit and suffered damage, there was no guarantee that Fuman would not get any funny ideas. Keeping him around any further would be trouble.

Han Cheng was suspicious by nature, and he was now like a tightly wound bird startled by the mere twang of a bow. He got up and looked at Fuman as he pressed in a few steps closer towards the latter, his killing intent already ignited.

Seeing as he was about to be decapitated soon, Fuman shouted out in desperation. “The Senior Grand Secretary—ordered me to investigate the case, so there’s still a chance to turn things around! The commander need not worry. I’ll surely clean it up. Those supervising officials from the Ministry of Justice are all my acquaintances. If anything goes awry again, I myself will bring my own head over to see you!”

Han Cheng could not kill him for real at this point in time, either. Seeing his ghastly pale face and how he looked so useless, he said, “Mess this up again, and the Empress Dowager will not keep you alive even if I want to. You want to be the top eunuch, but you also need to have the capability to!”

Fuman repeatedly concurred, his heart still in his mouth.

While it was overcast and rainy for days on end in Qudu, it was still sunny in the battle zone. The commanding generals of the three camps took turns rotating around the camps. Today, it was Xiao Chiye’s turn to head over to the Shayi Camp. Lu Guangbai stepped out of the military tent to receive him, and Xiao Chiye removed his helmet to greet him.

Lu Guangbai jumped to catch Xiao Chiye’s helmet and in doing so, saw the dent on it. “Hasen is much better than us at playing with the catapults.”

Xiao Chiye handed the reins to Chen Yang and remained standing in place to remove his arm guard. “The watchtower of Sha’er Camp collapsed after being smashed yesterday. Send a verbal message to shifu post-haste and have him get the military craftsmen to rush over to Sha’er Camp.”

“Jiming dispatched a new batch of military craftsmen this way. If you can’t wait, I’ll send the military craftsmen from the Bianbo Camp over to fill in.” Lu Guangbai returned the helmet to Chen Yang. “The wall of Shasan Camp was repaired, only to collapse again. Qianqiu-shifu can’t spare you any extra manpower on his end.”

Xiao Chiye had gotten a lot more tanned during this period of time. He watched Meng hovering over the camp. “The Biansha Cavalry numbers are increasing.”

After the Duanzhou Scorpions were encircled and annihilated, Hasen started to intensify his attacks on them. It was most glaringly obvious in the third month. Xiao Chiye realized Hasen was frenetically assembling men in the east, and the Biansha Cavalry numbers were skyrocketing. Last year, they could only launch an attack with their main forces while relying on their remaining soldiers to carry out sneak attacks, but now, Hasen was able to split up his forces to attack both camps at the same time.

“Amu’er put Hasen in the north, but did not head down south himself,” Lu Guangbai said. “That’s because he wanted to expand his territory deep into the desert and get the remaining six tribes to submit and pledge allegiance to him as soon as possible. It’s likely due to Amu’er’s newly-acquired helping hands that gives Hasen the cavalry to launch simultaneous attacks now.”

Xiao Chiye wiped the dust on his cheeks with a pensive expression.

Lu Guangbai continued, “But Hasen’s fighting of the battles has been very unstable of late.”

Xiao Chiye was the one who killed Achi. Hasen thought that Xiao Chiye would lead the new Armored Cavalry out into the world when he returned to the battle zone, but Xiao Chiye did not do so. That meant Hasen had no way of coming face to face with the new Armored Cavalry; it was as if they had swapped places. What was unknown to him was danger that could not be forestalled. Xiao Chiye was taking away Hasen’s initiative, one that would allow him to call the shots.

“The battles Hasen fought in the northern and southern battlefields are all battles that he was assured of victory.” Xiao Chiye turned his thumb ring. “Part of his victories stemmed from his familiarity with the commanding generals.”

That particular battle Qi Zhuyin fought in the battle zone was proof of this. Xiao Jiming realized this, and that was why he disrupted the order of the battle zone. It was when Hasen met with the Libei Armored Cavalry again that he realized what Xiao Jiming was doing.

Xiao Jiming was the kind of commander-in-chief Hasen disliked the most, because Xiao Jiming would not get flustered if he could not keep up with the pace. He always seemed to be able to maintain his composure. This was both Xiao Jiming's character and Xiao Jiming's style. He understood he could not beat Hasen, so he never thought of pitting himself against Hasen on the battlefield to emerge victorious—or not. What he had been doing these few months was to relax Libei's rhythm. The Armored Cavalry was in the process of recovery. Even if they could not win, they would not be led by the nose by Hasen as they had before.

"Hasen will get anxious too when he's standing so close to the goal," Xiao Chiye said in a deep, quiet voice. "After all, he also just wants to win."

Xiao Jiming wanted to leave the opportunity to Xiao Chiye.

Lu Guangbai looked at Xiao Chiye. "Amu'er has invested all his efforts in him. His win has a decisive bearing on Amu'er's dignity in the face of the Twelve Tribes. If he can't win this battle, he cannot become the future great ruler of the Twelve Tribes."

Xiao Chiye did not care why Hasen wanted to win at all; he only wanted Hasen's head.

As if understanding this point, Lu Guangbai did not continue, but said, "The source of Hasen's anxiety and apprehension comes from the south too. With Commander-in-chief Qi fighting the Qingshu Tribe, they have to face pressure from both sides."

But was Hasen really restless with anxiety over the north-south battlefield?

Xiao Chiye felt that there was another significance to Hasen's onslaughts of attack during this period of time. Perhaps Hasen wanted to use such a diversionary tactic to hide his target. Rather than fight wars of attrition with Libei and Qidong again, Zhongbo was actually the best place to attack.

Hasen was a master at feigns.

Like a wolf creeping in the darkness, Xiao Chiye stared fixedly at every move Hasen made. His understanding of Hasen had already far exceeded Hasen's understanding of him.

CHAPTER 232: SPRING FRESHET

“If I were Hasen,” Xiao Chiye squatted down and drew a simple map on the sand, “I’d attack Duanzhou.”

Shen Zechuan severed Amu’er’s supply route in Duanzhou, and Hasen’s military provision could only be apportioned to the six tribes in the desert. Amu’er allowed Hasen to marry Duo’erlan at the beginning of this year precisely because he needed the Hulu Tribe to supply food to the frontlines. Ever since the sixth month last year, the Biansha Cavalry never got the opportunity to cross into Dazhou to loot. This was the source of Hasen’s anxiety.

“In that case, you have to think about it carefully.” Lu Guangbai squatted down too and picked up a stone to press down on Xiao Chiye’s “Duanzhou”. “As long as you launch a surprise attack on Duanzhou, Shen Zechuan will mobilize Tantai Hu, who is on standby behind him to engage in a fierce battle with you in Duanzhou. Then Shen Zechuan will issue a deployment order to the Bianjun Commandery and Shasan Camp, and the reinforcements from both sides will trap you in Duanzhou, never to return.”

“I can run.” Xiao Chiye’s index finger circled around the stone. “I have the fastest cavalry. The goal is not to seize back Duanzhou but to loot Duanzhou’s granaries. I can even mount a surprise attack on the newly-built riding stables in Mount Luo on the way back. The reinforcements on both sides won’t be able to catch up.”

“You forgot Commander-in-chief Qi,” Lu Guangbai said. “When you leave the battle zone, Commander-in-chief Qi will move upstream and take a detour to Gedale to kick your ass.”

“That’s just what I want.” Xiao Chiye moved the stone to the Bianjun Commandery. “If the Commander-in-chief Qi takes a detour to Gedale, then I’ll give Qingshu Tribe’s territory to the Youxiong Tribe and let the Youxiong Tribe cut off Commander-in-chief Qi’s retreat route to trap her in Gedale before crushing her in one fell swoop.”

Lu Guangbai blocked the stone with the back of his hand and said, “Since Commander-in-chief Qi dares to penetrate deep into the enemy’s territory with an isolated force, she must have reinforcements. She can transfer the Cangjun Commandery Garrison Troops to the Bianjun Commandery and get the Cangjun Commandery Garrison Troops to fight back when the Youxiong Tribe mobilizes their troops to obstruct their path. Besides, the Youxiong Tribe has yet to pledge allegiance to Amu’er. They might not necessarily be willing to do it if you ask them to step out as shields to block the spears.”

“They definitely will,” Xiao Chiye said. “Youxiong Tribe’s initial refusal to submit to Amu’er was because they had the Qingshu Tribe to serve as a wall before them to obstruct the Qidong Garrison Troops. But the Qingshu Tribe has now been wiped out by Commander-in-chief Qi, and the Youxiong Tribe can’t hold their own against Commander-in-chief Qi’s next round of attacks. It’s only by pledging allegiance that they can get reinforcements from Amu’er.”

Lu Guangbai hesitated for a moment and put the stone back at Duanzhou. “Okay, if Commander-in-chief Qi doesn’t move, then I’ll guard Mount Luo beforehand.”

“I will destroy the bridle path leading from Mount Luo to Duanzhou during the surprise attack,” Xiao Chiye said. “Without the path, you will have to run in circles on Mount Luo and watch as my cavalry leaves.”

Lu Guangbai pushed the stone and said, “You have to cross the river on your return journey. I will lie in ambush at the banks of the Chashi River.”

“Even if you whittle down my military strength at the banks of the Chashi River,” Xiao Chiye raised his eyes, “my purpose has already been achieved.”

Lu Guangbai touched the bridge of his nose with the pulp of his finger and said with a bitter laugh, “...How ruthless.”

The Gobi desert and the wilderness lay along the banks of the Chashi River, and the ambushes Lu Guangbai excelled in relied on the use of the terrains. He had no advantage at the Chashi River. The “war chariot” battle formation could withstand the attacks of the cavalry, but it could not pursue an advancing cavalry. Lu Guangbai would not be able to catch up to them.

If Xiao Chiye’s speculation was right, then Hasen would not only be able to obtain supplies in this round of surprise attacks, but also set up a new obstruction for Qi Zhuyin in the south, thereby relieving him of the pressure in the north.

Xiao Chiye stretched out his five fingers and covered the map with it. “Hasen still has eyes in Qudu. He can see the whole picture.”

Twilight closed in on all sides, and smoke from the kitchen rose in the campground. Lu Guangbai sat on the ground and held that piece of stone in his palm as he watched a hue of orange wash over the camp walls. Under what remained of the sunset glow, he said to Xiao Chiye, “You can’t leave.”

With Hasen launching an onslaught of violent attacks at the battle zone, they were all tied down here with no spare time to be in two places attending to different matters at once.

“That means he’s starting to run out of food.” Xiao Chiye stared at the map between his fingers. “If he can’t contain us, he will lose a portion of his elites in Duanzhou.”

Hasen was suppressing the main forces of the three battle zone camps. Only by wearing down the three camps’ main forces to the point of exhaustion would he be able to let his elite forces mount a surprise attack on Duanzhou. By then, Libei would be too exhausted to respond to the attack, and the threat posed by the reinforcements would fall. That would be the most optimal opportunity for him.

Lu Guangbai tossed the stone to Xiao Chiye and said, “This is an opportunity we can manipulate.”

This bout of surprise attack was no longer terrifying as long as they could see through Hasen’s motives. Hasen could make a feign, but so could the Libei Armored Cavalry. Fighting wars of attrition was detrimental to both parties, but Xiao Chiye was more confident of success—he had Shen Zechuan’s supply of military provisions.

To date, the only person who could really threaten Amu’er in the war was Shen Zechuan. His supply route was just like a cobweb that held the three territories in the east secured and unassailable.

“Drag it out till the end of the sixth month.” Xiao Chiye caught the stone and placed it on the messily drawn map. “I’ll lead the elites of Sha’er Camp to Bianjun Commandery. You and shifu can put on a show of fatigue under Hasen’s attacks. The weakening of his attacks will be the precursor to a sudden assault on Duanzhou, at which time I’ll be waiting for him in Duanzhou.”

Three months was just right. When Hasen dispatched his troops to launch a surprise attack, it would be the season when the granaries were in abundance. He would not miss this timing.

The sky had already darkened by the time both men spoke to this point. Xiao Chiye stood up and whistled at the sky, and Meng flapped its wings and circled before landing back on Xiao Chiye’s shoulder a short while later. Lu Guangbai patted the dust off his robe and walked side by side with Xiao Chiye towards the military tent.

Chen Yang, who was waiting at the entrance, lifted the flap of the tent for them. As Xiao Chiye entered the tent, he whispered, “Master, the letters from His Lordship and Gu Jin have both arrived.”

Xiao Chiye took the letters and stood at the entrance to read them.

Lu Guangbai drank half a bowl of milk tea, and when he heard no movement from Xiao Chiye after a while, he looked back to see Xiao Chiye with a gloomy expression.

A few days later, Fuman arrived at the courtyard of the Grand Secretariat office as summoned. Before entering, he changed out of his damp covering and bundled up his robe to stride in and pay his obeisances to Kong Qiu.

Kong Qiu sat by the window and merely uttered a sound of acknowledgment as he gestured for Fuman to get up. Fuman straightened up in a restrained manner and stood waiting in attendance at the far end. His eyes swept around the black boots at the sides, more or less recognizing the court officials present.

“...The spring plowing has just ended. Huaizhou bought a batch of grains from Baimazhou, and Jiang Qingshan sold it to him based on the conversion of grain price in Juexi.” Liang Cuishan finished his report.

A few of Kong Qiu’s hairs had turned white during this period of time, although they were not obvious to the eyes concealed under his wusha hat. He said, “Qidong is fighting a war now, so Qidong naturally has priority for the military funds. The Eight Great Training Divisions' military expenses can be reduced as needed."

Here it comes, Fuman thought. If the Grand Secretariat wanted to continue investigating the accounts as they wanted, then they had to first pare down Han Cheng's power.

"That's what the Ministry of War intends." The Minister of War, Chen Zhen, tapped his smoking pipe twice. "But Han Cheng refuses. He wants the writ from the Grand Secretariat."

"What he wants is approval, doesn't he?" Cen Yu said. "The Dancheng case has yet to conclude, and to avoid casting aspersions on herself, the Empress Dowager can't approve it. Since the Grand Secretariat has brought it up with him, it means that everyone is in agreement with it. But look at him, refusing to do it so brazenly."

The Empress Dowager could barely fend for herself, so where would she still have her earlier authority to make approvals? The Hua clan of Dicheng was on tenterhooks now. What was the Heir Apparent poisoned with? Everyone present knew it all too well. It was to preserve the last bit of the Empress Dowager's dignity that Kong Qiu tossed the Heir Apparent's case to Fuman and let the inner court investigate.

Han Cheng was still holding the post of the Imperial Bodyguards' Commander. He meant to take the path Hua Siqian once took, by relying on the Eight Great Training Divisions to challenge the Grand Secretariat.

Fuman had been buttering his bread on both sides, waiting for just this moment. He could no longer remain on the noble clan's boat, but he could still jump onto the Grand Secretariat's ship. He had shown his face before Hai Liangyi, and he had spent the longest time in the Grand Secretariat's office compound. The junior eunuch's address of "zuzong" was not casually given, but because he really carried this weight among them. He kept such a tight grip on the Heir Apparent's case because he wanted to extricate himself clean and to make Fengquan the scapegoat.

Emperor Tiancheng favored Mu Ru, and he incurred the displeasure of the Grand Secretariat when he made an exception to promote Fengquan. Even the Chief Surveillance Bureau censured him. Later, when Emperor Tianchen died in Mu Ru's hands, it was only through Xue Xiuzhuo's grace that Fengquan could continue to drag out an ignoble existence.

Fuman did not dare to incur the wrath of Xue Xiuzhuo, but he had come to discern that the Heir Apparent was the future master of Dazhou. He had to kick out Fengquan before he could get a spot for himself beside the Heir Apparent. He was counting on the Heir Apparent for his future decades of wealth and glory to come.

As for Han Cheng and Kong Qiu, Fuman did not make much of them. Think about Pan Rugui. Pan Rugui could assemble the Pan Faction and sit on equal footing with Hua Siqian exactly because he had the trust of Emperor Guangcheng at that time. It was no easy feat being a eunuch, having to be commanded around like a dog, but find the right master, and you would be a dog that lorded it over the masses—a dog that everyone had to deferentially address as “zuzong” on sight.

Fuman was just thinking about this when he suddenly sensed Kong Qiu looking at him. He immediately stepped forward to bow, a complete about-face from his attitude in front of Han Cheng as he spoke with deference. “This humble slave has traced what the Grand Secretary has told me to investigate. The seasonal vegetables consumed by the Heir Apparent that day all came from our Garden Service.”

“Isn’t that specially meant for the palace?” Kong Qiu asked, “Who is the eunuch-in-charge?”

“It’s someone called Yinzhu.” Fuman continued, “This humble slave has carefully interrogated all the people serving in the Heir Apparent’s palace. None of them have anything to do with the Garden Service. The rules in the palace are strict, and they do not normally cross paths.”

“Something was wrong with the seasonal vegetables of the Garden Service, and yet it could pass through so many hands to be served before the Heir Apparent. This would not have been possible if the perpetrator wasn’t capable.” Kong Qiu was in charge of the Ministry of Justice, and his train of thought was clear and organized. “Moreover, it is impossible to have such a clear grasp on the Heir Apparent’s preferences without at least half a year of effort.”

Fuman repeatedly made sounds of agreement and said, “This humble slave did in fact find such a person.”

Kong Qiu locked eyes with Cen Yu. “Who?”

Fuman looked hesitant as he wavered for a moment before answering. “It’s Fengquan.”

Fengquan had once held the position of the Seal-holding Director in the Directorate of Ceremonial, and the Garden Service was under the jurisdiction of the Seal-holding Director; it also had ties to the Directorate for Palace Delicacies. He was not only the Heir Apparent's attendant, but also the person the Empress Dowager wanted to protect back then. As compared to a universal flatterer like Fuman, who fawned on everyone he came across, Fengquan could not be erased of suspicion at all.

Kong Qiu furrowed his brows. "Isn't this person already dead?"

"That's right," Fuman answered softly, "but he stayed by the Heir Apparent side for over half a year. He looked different, so much that this humble slave did not recognize him when he was serving in attendance in Mingli Hall."

Kong Qiu did not respond immediately. All of them had only just gone silent when they heard the announcement of Xue Xiuzhuo's arrival from the entrance. Liang Cuishan was well aware of the art of preserving his life; the matters of the inner court concerned the Heir Apparent and were not affairs he could meddle in, so he took the opportunity to get to his feet and retreated out just as Xue Xiuzhuo entered.

Xue Xiuzhuo's wusha hat<sup>56</sup> was slightly damp from the rain. Even when he saw Fuman standing in attendance at the side upon his entrance into the hall, he did not ask about it and bowed to Kong Qiu. Kong Qiu did not bring up Fengquan and told Xue Xiuzhuo to take his seat for discussions.

Chashi River thawed, and the warmth of spring in Duanzhou abruptly disappeared. Drizzle fell for several consecutive days, pelting the peach blossoms in the courtyard until they had all fallen to cover the ground in a wet blanket of red. Shen Zechuan had to discuss affairs with the advisors in the hall, and a sitting typically took several hours, so Fei Sheng added a charcoal brazier in the hall to dispel the cold.

"Yan Heru has not shown up for so long, and the businesses in Hezhou are now in a mess. The merchants are making such a ruckus for fear that the deals they agreed on at the start of the year will fall through. They came to Chazhou in the hope of discussing it over with Your Lordship." Yu Xiaozai sat to the right of Kong Ling, near the charcoal brazier. He continued, "There's also a need to make contact with the local yamen where the port is. We have to send someone there as soon as possible."

Yao Wenyu seemed fine today. He said, "The spring plowing has just ended, so the yamen in the various lands are all able to transfer manpower over. Then there's still Wang Xian, who is familiar with taxation, in Chazhou. There's no reason for Your Lordship to meet them in person."

“Stick to however the business was conducted in the past.” Shen Zechuan held the hand warmer<sup>57</sup> between his palms. “A Wang Xian will suffice.”

Wang Xian used to be the Secretary of the Ministry of Revenue who had contended with the various ministries before. Even Xiao Chiye had hit a brick wall when it came to him. There was no one more suitable than him to discuss with the merchants.

“The Yan clan was the one greasing the Prefectural Prefect of Liuzhou’s wheels. Ask them if they can find Yan Heru or not. If not,” Shen Zechuan turned over the document and continued, “hurry up and push out someone capable of taking on the matter.”

Qi Zhuyin had yet to return to Qidong. The Yan clan had to complete delivery of the remaining military provisions in the fourth month. No doubt anyone could ever find Yan Heru again. At present, they were fighting through the roof at home. Shen Zechuan dropped them a reminder to hand over the grains first before they split up the properties and break up the family.

The matters today were more or less finished being discussed. Seeing that Qiao Tianya had still yet to return from the military drill grounds, he said, “Youjing spoke about the details of the various prefectures yamen, the situations of which are extremely complicated and cannot be lumped together in the same breath. Go back and ready a book for submission. Do it like how Shenwei does it; keep it brief and concise. Also, shifu is in my courtyard, so Yuanzhuo shall have his meal together with me today.”

The advisors all stood up one after another and bowed to the Prefectural Lord before taking their leave.

Ji Gang was under the eaves, watching Ding Tao train. Seeing the advisors coming out, he sent Ding Tao to instruct the kitchen to prepare the dishes. Remembering Fei Sheng’s instruction, Ding Tao left Li Xiong in the courtyard to protect the Prefectural Lord, while he himself leaped down the steps and dashed off to deliver the message.

Originally, Qiao Tianya was the one pushing Yao Wenyu in his wheelchair, but these days, Ji Gang had taken over the job. By the time Qiao Tianya returned, it was already dark.

Ding Tao and Li Xiong stood guard at each side like a pair of door deities.<sup>58</sup> He folded his arm and said with cool detachment to Qiao Tianya, “If His Lordship hasn’t summoned you, you can’t enter—”

Qiao Tianya pressed down Ding Tao's head and lifted the hanging screen to cast a glance into the main room.

"He already left!" Ding Tao broke free. "After the meal, His Lordship asked Grandpa to push him back."

"You should have said so earlier." Qiao Tianya then asked, "Where's the Prefectural Lord?"

"It's time for His Lordship to take a break," Ding Tao answered. "He's in the bath now."

"You didn't even get someone to close the windows in the hall. The wind is strong and cold at night." Qiao Tianya scared Ding Tao. "Freeze the Prefectural Lord, and Old Fei the Tenth is going to nag at you all night when he returns later."

Ding Tao had indeed forgotten about this, but he said, "I remembered. I was just about to close them!"

Having said that, he turned and made his way into the hall to close the windows one at a time. As he withdrew out of the room, the back of his head bumped into something hard. He reacted quickly and covered his head, thinking Fei Sheng was back. He looked back and was just about to speak when he shrank his neck back and shut up.

Xiao Chiye set down Langli Blade, which was blocking Ding Tao, and inclined his head slightly to look for Shen Zechuan. His face was damp, both from the rain and his sweat, and the heavy armor on him had yet to be removed. His boots were all dirty too.

This was him riding all the way back in a rush after getting off the battlefield.

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 入赘 of a man marrying into the wife's household, thereby taking on the wife's surname and becoming an member of the wife's clan.
2. 军屯 military troops stationed in the border regions who carry out garrison duties as well as farm crops to supply the border garrisons and themselves with grains.

- 3.
4. 折子 zhezi, is a booklet in accordion form with a slipcase, used for keeping accounts, etc.
5. 黃冊 Huangce or yellow registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household's classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.
6. 海纳百川，有容乃大(；壁立千仞，无欲则刚。) A couplet written by Lin Zexu (林则徐).
i.e. the greatness of a man lies in his tolerance of others, just like the vast sea can accommodate a hundred rivers.
7. Refer to chapter 163 for recap.
8. The Art of Rulership/Governance of the Sovereign: The technique of checks and balances was one of the most common political tools used by the emperors in ancient China to govern their officials.
9. 及冠 or 弱冠, a man's 20th birthday, i.e., coming of age at 20 for a male.
10. Note: to clarify, the term used here specifically refers to "Crown Prince" or in Li Jianting's case, a "crown princess" or heir apparent/successor to the throne. Using the latter since it sounds more "neutral" :V
11. For those who forgot, Xiaowu was an Imperial Bodyguard who appeared in early chapters.
12. The term 爷 (sir, lord, master) is a form of address for an official or wealthy person in former times. Ge Qingqing called him lord (or old master; 老爷) as a form of respect for his official position, while the functionary called him master (爷) in reference to his wealthy-merchant-pay-huge-tax/bribe status (i.e., bowing to money).

13. 冰敬 Literally, 'Ice Respect' (or paying respect with 'ice' during summer) is one of the objectionable practices of 'Three Respects' during the Qing Dynasty, along with 'Coal Respect' and 'Departure Respect'. 'Ice Respect' refers to the bribe money officials outside the capital used to bribe the officials in the capital during summertime.

14.

15. 劲装 Jin Zhuang is a more body-fitting outfit (compared to the usual loose, flowing robes) with the sleeves secured to make movements easier and less restrictive. It's usually worn by martial arts practitioners to facilitate combat.

16. 清流 renowned and unsullied scholars who were concerned with politics but held themselves aloof from those in power

17. 殿试 palace examination, the final and highest imperial examination, presided over by the emperor himself.

18. 老十哥 Old (Fei the) Tenth-ge

19. 六婶 sixth auntie

20. 锦衣骑 is based on 锦衣卫, or the Imperial Bodyguards also more literally known as the Embroidered Uniform Guards or the Brocade Guards. So in the same vein, 锦衣骑 could also be considered the Embroidered Uniform Cavalry or Brocade Cavalry.

21. 天妒英才 literally Heaven is jealous of the talented (so it makes them undergo great sufferings in life and erm, stuff).

- 22.
23. 蹴鞠 cuju, ancient Chinese ball game with similarities to soccer.

- 24.
25. Specifically 鲤鱼打挺 carp kip-up, a martial arts move where one leaps from a supine position into a standing position.
26. 黃冊 Huangce or yellow registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household's classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.
27. 家生子 Children of domestic servants or slaves. These children were also born in the household and also served as servants and slaves in the same household.

28.

29. 包袱, a cloth bundle. In the old days, people traveled around with their clothes and possessions bundled up with a piece of cloth. The bundle was then worn across the shoulders and carried around.

30. 白泽 baize, an auspicious, white-colored mythical creature in Chinese mythology.

31.

32. 补子 rank badges or mandarin squares, was a large embroidered badge sewn onto the surcoat of an official to indicate the rank of the official wearing it. E.g., the use of squares depicting birds for civil officials and animals for military officials; there were even “seasonal” squares like the gourd.

- 33.
34. 五珠 wuzhu, literally five pearls
35. 铎针 duozhen, an ornament on the official hat of Ming Dynasty.
36. 汗马 literally sweating horse, refers to distinguished military service.
37. 老祖宗 literally old ancestor or forefather; sometimes the top eunuch in the Ming Dynasty are privately addressed as such. This refers to Pan Rugui in earlier chapters.
38. 经筵 classics colloquium, a gathering of the Emperor with eminent civil officials of the general administrative agencies in the capital, of the Hanlin Academy, of the Directorate of Education, etc., for the reading and discussion of classical and historical texts.
39. 军屯 military troops (mostly in border regions) who carry out garrison duties and farm crops to supply the border garrisons with grains.

40.

41.

42. 汤婆子 tangpozi, a small portable hand warmer that looks like a little pot.

43.

44. 斂衽 This pose, if a bow or curtsy was made as well, was actually a form of obeisance made by women as a sign of respect

45.

46. 花钿 known as huadian, these are flower embellishments affixed or painted onto the forehead for cosmetic purposes. Flowers are common patterns, although there may be others.

47.

48. 太师椅 Taishi Chair or Grand Preceptor Chair, is a classical style of a wooden armchair in ancient China.

49.

50. Phoenix refers to the empress, just like the dragon refers to the emperor.

51. 纲常 i.e. the three cardinal ethical relationships of social order (including the relationship between the ruler and his subject) and the five constant virtues in Confucianism.

52. 乌纱帽 wusha hat, or black gauze hat, is the headwear of Ming dynasty officials, comprising a black hat with two wing-like flaps of thin, oval-shaped boards on each side.

53. White is also associated with death and mourning, and white paper lanterns were often used in funerals and to indicate death in the family.

54. Recap: Chapter 83. In Chinese customs, rice wine or tea is poured onto the ground (usually in front of an altar or tombstone) as an offering to the deities or in honor of the deceased.

55. 一盏茶 literally a cup of tea worth of time, roughly about 15 minutes.

56. 清谈 Qingtán is a Chinese philosophical movement and social practice among political and intellectual elites where the literati engaged in highly sophisticated intellectual and philosophical discussions on lofty and non-mundane matters.

57. 远交近攻 “Befriend a distant state; attack one nearby” from the Thirty-Six Stratagems (三十六计). This was first seen in chapter 50.

58.

59. 纲常 i.e., the three cardinal ethical relationships of social order (including the relationship between the ruler and his subject, father and son, husband and wife) and the five constant virtues in Confucianism.

60. 酒醋面局 One of the twenty-four yamen of the palace eunuchs in the Ming Dynasty. In charge of condiments such as vinegar, sauces, and so on.

- 61.
- 62. 蟒纹曳撒 yisan or also read as yesa
- 63. 烟墩帽 a hat worn by eunuchs in the Ming Dynasty.
- 64. 司苑局 One of the eight eunuch services under the Twenty-Four Yamen, in charge of fruits and vegetables.

- 65.
- 66. 狗皮膏药 specifically dogskin plaster (the white and black plaster on his face), a medicinal plaster in Traditional Chinese Medicine used for treating rheumatism, strain, contusion, etc which is pasted to the skin.

67. i.e., of someone seeking help and protection from someone more powerful.

68. 乌纱帽 wusha hat, or black gauze hat, is the headwear of Ming dynasty officials, comprising a black hat with two wing-like flaps of thin, oval-shaped boards on each side.

69. 汤婆 a small portable hand warmer that looks like a little pot.
Also known as tangpo.

70.

71. 门神 a door god or divine guardians whose main duties were to protect a building, threshold, or household against evil influences or to encourage the entrance of positive ones. Usually, stickers or papers of these deities are pasted on the door to signify their protection.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 233 : TO LOVE AND TO FEAR

The rain was still falling when Shen Zechuan returned to his room. Wearing a wide-sleeved robe, but without his wooden clogs, he walked on the corridor leading to the bedchamber and heard a few crashes of muffled thunder. Damp wind pounced on his face through the newly cut window screen, while the staccato sound of rain dispelled the stifling sensation Shen Zechuan was feeling from having sat for too long.

Candlesticks stood by the sides of the corridor, making it brighter than the bedchamber itself. Shen Zechuan stood there without moving, as if wanting to get some air. Shadows peeped through the bamboo blinds to lay exposed on the rug in the bedchamber, while the orange candlelight gave his silhouette a glow and rendered the skin slightly to the side of his neck a shade of vivid red.

The fourth month was the season when crop seedlings sprouted and grew. If this bout of spring rain persisted, the Duanzhou fields near the Chashi River might end up inundated by the spring flood. Shen Zechuan gave Kong Ling instructions regarding the Duanzhou dams last month, but he forgot to ask about it today. Reckoning that Fei Sheng should be back by now, Shen Zechuan lifted the bamboo blinds and searched the bedchamber for the wooden clogs he had kicked off in preparation of summoning Fei Sheng over to question him.

Xiao Chiye, having long removed his armor, was lying sleepily on the bed with his head pillowed on both arms. On hearing movements, he turned over, and at the same time Lanzhou picked up his wooden clogs, he pushed the lowered drapes aside and poked his head out.

Caught off guard, Shen Zechuan got a fright and dropped the wooden clogs.

With his hands gripping the drapes, Xiao Chiye asked, “Is what happened to the Venerable Master true?”

Shen Zechuan schooled his expression slightly and nodded.

Seeing Shen Zechuan’s nod, Xiao Chiye’s heart, which had been on tenterhooks the entire way, plummeted completely into the ditch. He fell back onto the bedding and spread out his arms, looking as if he was about to die soon.

Supporting himself against the edge of the bed, Shen Zechuan looked at Xiao Chiye and tentatively probed, “Did you run all the way back for this?”

In order to find Yideng, Xiao Chiye had scoured the entire Libei and watched on as Xiao Jiming wrote more than a dozen letters to the Venerable Master. But he did not even get to see him, and the man was now gone. After a long silence, he asked, “Where’s Yan Heru?”

Shen Zechuan made a brutal, slitting gesture along his neck.

Xiao Chiye fell silent for a moment with a frosty and grave expression. He suddenly turned over and buried his face into the pillow, refusing to show his face to Shen Zechuan. If he had a tail, it would be drooping on the ground right now.

“We’ll head over to Juexi to look for physicians.” Xiao Chiye paused for a moment before continuing. “And there’s still the Imperial Academy of Medicine in Qudu.”

Shen Zechuan did not say a word. His icy cold hand covered the side of Xiao Chiye’s neck and slid up to stroke his cheek. Xiao Chiye grabbed hold of this hand and grasped it in his palm. The rain doused his wrath, extinguishing it, leaving only disappointment and panic in its wake. He attempted to soothe his emotions, but this feeling was too complicated.

“Ce’an,” Shen Zechuan called out to him.

Xiao Chiye said, “There are innumerable highly skilled physicians in the world living in seclusion or retirement. We’ll find as many as there are available. As long as it’s a physician...”

Shen Zechuan suddenly pulled his hand out. The moment Xiao Chiye’s palm turned up empty, Xiao Chiye made to sit up, but Shen Zechuan pressed him back into place by his back.

“A-Ye.” Shen Zechuan propped himself up with his arms and lowered his head to say with a rare unyielding toughness, “You heard Qianqiu-shifu’s words before. Even with the Venerable Master, the illness may not necessarily be eradicated at its roots. But this body is still not in that terrible of a state.” He slowed and relaxed his voice. “I’ve been taking my medicines on time, and not once have I fallen sick this year.”

Xiao Chiye’s sprawled back tensed.

Shen Zechuan bumped his head against the back of Xiao Chiye's shoulder and said in a soft voice, "I won't leave you."

The rain outside the room pitter-pattered down with finely-woven beats. Xiao Chiye's chest cavity was all but a damp, clammy expanse. Shen Zechuan stuck the side of his face to Xiao Chiye's tattoo through the fabric, where a scar lay.

"You're lying to me." Xiao Chiye answered in the same soft voice.

Xiao Chiye once thought that Xiao Fangxu would not leave him, but separation came in such haste that he did not even get to bid his old man farewell. There existed a hidden boundary line between man and man. Stride over that line, and that goes what one called parting by death. It was a whole other world no one could ever catch up with.

"You gave this life to the Grand Mentor." Xiao Chiye's voice sounded oppressively heavy in the darkness. "You made a vow to him to kill his mortal enemies, and you stood alone before the noble clans without fear. You wanted me to leave back in Qudu, and you hurt yourself in Chazhou and Dunzhou."

These were ticking time bombs left behind by those two incidents. They lay hidden in Xiao Chiye's heart, ballooning to unbearable proportions after Xiao Fangxu left. Xiao Chiye only had to think about it to feel the fear after the fact. The source of his panic was not just Shen Zechuan's health, but also Shen Zechuan himself.

Xiao Chiye continued, "Lanzhou, you only have to harden your heart, and you'd be able to leave me behind."

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 234 : NOBODY

Raindrops drummed against the door eaves, like an extension of Shen Zechuan's mood. He could openly put on a hundred displays of indulging in desires before Xiao Chiye, but he found it hard to extend this frankness verbally to Xiao Chiye. He was the most eloquent orator in this world, and also the most inarticulate one.

"I once gave this life to Teacher, because there was no home to call mine in this world. A-Ye, when I first stood before the halls of Qudu, what I saw was the door to this life of mine. Stride inside, and Duanzhou would no longer be my hometown. I knew my elder brother would vanish among my dreams, and I knew that no one in this world would ever forgive me."

Shen Zechuan had never gone into battle to fight against the enemies, nor had he sat in the imperial court a far distance away. He was an ordinary man who came face to face with the scimitars, and it was precisely because he was an ordinary man that the wails of the six prefectures lingered in his ears every night and the bloodbath in the sinkhole haunted his mind all the time. He kneeled in the snowstorm raging at the sinkhole and experienced a separation by death. Overnight, he became the enemy of the entire world.

He had done nothing.

But he was guilty, and his sin went by the name Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan watched the Biansha Cavalry massacre Duanzhou. Forty thousand men pressed down on his back, pinning him, and because he survived, he was forever held captive here. His struggles were insignificant.

Those anguished cries of his were worth nothing before forty thousand corpses.

Shen Zechuan could not live on.

He was, in that game of chess, a nobody. His pain was merely the puff of dust stirred up by its players' coughs. The moment he understood this, he lost what it meant to "live". Ji Gang told him to keep living, but the heroes and the sycophants were still mutually tearing into each other. Keep living, and he would still be reduced to being a pawn someday. He would be dragging on his miserable existence merely to wait for death to claim him so that he could enter the next cycle of reincarnation.

Back at the derelict Zhaozui Temple, Qi Huilian raised his arms like a madman and shouted out for the crown prince, but in this world, there was no longer a crown prince. Were the legitimate bloodlines of the noble clans the only ones who could become the hands that hold the world in its control? Were the distinguished, noble-born prides of heaven the only ones worthy of possessing the power to stir up a storm? If that were the case, then all the innumerable ordinary folks in the world were the bones of the dead at the foot of the stairs! They were the subjugated ones meant to be trampled on, the dehumanized ones who suffered no pain, and the silenced ones who would not moan in anguish. They were nobodies!

"What did we do wrong?"

Qi Huilian cried out this phrase with inconsolable grief.

What exactly did we do wrong?!

Shen Zechuan once lifted Xiao Chiye by the collar in a filthy alley, ripping open his mask of forbearance to question the same words with his voice breaking.

You and I, what did we do wrong?

If living was a sin, that meant Heaven was holding him down by his head intending for him to kneel in the dust and continue being a nobody. But Shen Zechuan met Qi Huilian. He watched as the Grand Mentor acted all demented, and listened as the lone crow let loose a plaintive wail. He was forced to the edge of the precipice. If he could not take out the courage to burn his bridges and fight to the death, then he would have to venture down this path Heaven preordained for him and kill himself once more.

"I am Qi Huilian of Yuzhou. I taught the Crown Prince. And I'll now teach you everything I have learned in my life—alright?"

What Shen Zechuan saw was a way to live. That was not only a path where he could kneel and gasp for breath, but also one where he could stand on his feet. Was victory assured just because one was born the descendant of a noble clan? The moment in which Qi Huilian went on his knees was when the paradigm shifted. He had torn down that wall much earlier than anyone else, even Shen Zechuan.

Qi Huilian was the teacher of the emperor; he would only teach someone heading into that position. He reached out to Shen Zechuan not only because he was forced into a dead end but also because this was the most insane of the Grand Mentor's schemes.

"If Teacher imparts the classics to me, I'll kill your enemy for you."

Shen Zechuan's hatred was scattered all over in Qudu, those faint, blurry lights of untold numbers. It was Qi Huilian who converged them together with the words "enmity".

Unruffled is the orchid that grows on stone steps. Boundless is the horizon of the boat that crosses the sea of misery.

Qi Huilian molded Shen Lanzhou into being, and he pushed a sharp Shen Zechuan back into his sheath with the aim of obliterating all the self-resentments that sustained Shen Zechuan and kept him hanging onto life. He wanted to set Shen Zechuan's path right, so that Shen Zechuan could see himself for who he truly was.

Xue Xiuzhuo did not make the wrong move; he had simply been a tad too late. Qi Huilian had long already possessed his own Heir Apparent.

Rainwater washed over the eaves. Shen Zechuan fell silent after he had said those words. He buried his face into Xiao Chiye's back, just like how Xiao Chiye had buried his face into the pillow.

Shen Zechuan did not value his life; death was not at all scary. The hooves of all those vying for supremacy would not skirt around anyone. The promised lands of the world were all built upon the sharpest blades. If he died, then that only went to prove that Shen Zechuan failed in his quest to win the throne.

He did not care.

Would a hand that had been cut hurt?

To Shen Zechuan, that was for him to find out, but he had to be cut first before he would know the answer.

Qi Huilian did not manage to tether him. He was a blade without a hilt, one that would spill blood when held. No one else in the world other than himself could wield it. He strode away from everything else, all to achieve his aim of “freedom”.

He was free when he killed Ji Lei.

That made Qi Huilian realize for the first time that he had honed Shen Zechuan, but did not keep him fully sheathed. All Shen Zechuan learned was to deal a fatal blow without making so much a sound. At that time, Shen Zechuan had his first taste of carnal pleasure, when the battered, scarred host experienced the mirth of this body; that was the joy of being “alive”. He did not even realize it to be the prelude to the blade’s return to its sheath.

This squall from Libei swept away Shen Zechuan’s nightmares. Xiao Chiye aggressively invaded Shen Zechuan’s heart, dominating it. His strong, powerful arms blocked out all the din. In the deepest recesses of that quagmire, he gate-crashed his way in to catch a sniff of the fragrance of this gem.

Avaricious wolf.

“Teacher returned this life to me, A-Ye.” Shen Zechuan melted under this familiar scent and nuzzled his cheek against Xiao Chiye’s back like a young cub that had come searching by following the scent. “A-Ye...”

Xiao Chiye raised his hand to hold down Shen Zechuan and partially looked back to look him in the eye.

Shen Zechuan opened his eyes, but there was no hint of joking in those orbs. He moved Xiao Chiye’s face closer and said, “I am yours, even in death. And you are mine too.” He finally revealed the part of him that was sharp and ruthless. “I will kill whoever wants to take you away from my side.”

Not even the King of Hell can do so.

At first, Shen Zechuan thought what he cherished was not life but Xiao Chiye. Gradually, he came to learn that a cut finger would hurt; however, that finger was not the one in pain, but Xiao Chiye. Living was tough, but in the process of living, he found even more reasons to live. He was the continuation of Ji Mu’s life, of Qi Huilian’s, of Zhongbo’s, and of all the nobodies’ in this volatile, tempestuous storm—they all existed and lived through him.

“I want to live to a ripe old age with you.” Shen Zechuan planted a light kiss on Xiao Chiye’s temple. “In a place no one can reach.”

Xiao Chiye grabbed back Shen Zechuan's hand and turned around to take him into his arms. Then, cupping Shen Zechuan's cheeks, he closed in for a look.

"Tired from the journey?" Shen Zechuan asked in an undertone.

"Nope." Xiao Chiye caressed Shen Zechuan's cheeks. "I get through the days by thinking of you."

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 235 : SCOUNDREL

Xiao Chiye claimed not to be tired, but he still fell asleep under the murmurs and whispers. He had been rather pressed for time to rest after being swapped over to Sha'er Camp. It was only because Mount Luo was close to Duanzhou and the bridle path ran smooth and unobstructed that he was able to rush back to sleep by Lanzhou's side.

The rain intensified following several claps of spring thunder in the distance in the latter half of the night. As Xiao Chiye had something weighing on his mind, he woke up at the hour of yin. Shen Zechuan nuzzled against his temple, his breathing smooth and even as he slept soundly. Xiao Chiye listened to the sound of Lanzhou's breathing for a moment and felt inexplicably unable to simply resign himself to it.

Half-awake, Shen Zechuan uttered a "hm". He liked to drag out his nasal sounds, making it hard to say if he was in pain or feeling good each time. Xiao Chiye bit him, making him rock a little under his slightly urgent gasps.

"Don't bite." Shen Zechuan's still half-asleep voice was slightly hoarse. He did not even open his eyes as he muttered indistinctly, "It's all red now."

It was indeed red.

Shen Zechuan sobered up a little. Xiao Chiye was pinning down on him, leaving him with nowhere to hide. It was as if he was being assaulted by the rain in the face of this force. There was no distance between them. Sweat spread to their chests, soaking the bedding until it was all damp.

Xiao Chiye lowered his head and pressed his ear to Lanzhou's lips.

Shen Zechuan was on the verge of breaking. He knew what Xiao Chiye wanted to hear in this clammy atmosphere. He spoke and breathed of love, his expressive eyes misted over as he shivered intermittently under the pounding of the waves.

The downside about being in such synchronous tune with one another was that even a momentary separation would stir up a storm of passion that made them crave to be sated and to use sensual pleasure to make up for the gap in which they were apart.

Xiao Chiye desired.

And still desired more.

"Hn—"

Shen Zechuan could not help himself and tilted his soaked neck back—this was a vulnerability that reared its head when he took Xiao Chiye in.

Under the clamor of the rain beneath the eaves, a person in a straw rain cape approached. When a knock sounded from the door, Shen Zechuan raised a hand and made to clutch the hanging drapes of the bed, but Xiao Chiye grabbed his wrist in midair, holding it up as his strong, tanned arms secured Shen Zechuan in place.

The person outside waited for a moment, then knocked on the door again.

Shen Zechuan kept his voice down, "Not... not Fei..."

Xiao Chiye did not give a damn about who was at the door. His desire was raging. He wanted to dominate. Only he could see, bite, and exert himself so hard that Lanzhou begged for mercy.

Their breaths intermingled.

"Chuan-er? It's already the second quarter of the hour of mao! Chengfeng is heading down to the fields for a look. Are you going? If so, I'll prepare your overcoat for you. Drink some soup before you go over." Ji Gang had woken up early and even trained for a few rounds, after which he had come over with a bowl of soup in hand.

Xiao Chiye hissed in chagrin and shoved everything that was superfluous away to confine Lanzhou.

In too deep.

Shen Zechuan soundlessly mouthed.

A-Ye, too—

He turned his head to the side and buried his gasps in the bedding, hiding them deep under the roar of the rain.

Xiao Chiye was panting too. Under those heavy gasps for breath, he let loose a dangerous laugh and admired the flush at the sides of Lanzhou's neck, all without so much a pause.

This is going to be the death of me.

Xiao Chiye thought diabolically.

Possessing Shen Zechuan in such a way gave him a climactic high.

Not hearing any movements, Ji Gang turned to ask Fei Sheng, "What time did the Prefectural Lord retire to bed last night?"

That's hard for me to say, man, Fei Sheng inwardly thought to himself. Holding an umbrella over Ji Gang's birdcage, he answered, "Quite late... Now that Mister Yu has returned, he has to report on matters regarding the six prefectures' yamen to the Prefectural Lord these few days."

"Didn't he take his leave early yesterday?" Ji Gang was worried that Shen Zechuan would fall ill during this spring rain. "Youjing has to stay until the rain stops this time. There is no rush to complete his assignments now."

"Exactly." Fei Sheng concurred. "Shifu, you understand it best."

Fei Sheng only wanted to send shifu out of the courtyard as soon as possible. Second Master was still inside, and if they were to cross paths later, wouldn't the game be over?! He lifted Ji Gang's birdcage and said, "Shifu, this bird looks so listless. Could it have gotten frozen from the cold?!"

"It gets sleepy after a meal. This bird is just the same as Ding Tao's sparrow." Ji Gang grew increasingly worried after not hearing an answer from Shen Zechuan for so long. "There's no one inside to attend to him either."

"How about I send you to the side hall for a seat? We'll drink a few cups of hot tea. Master should be awake in a while."

Ji Gang lifted the birdcage back. As Fei Sheng took over the soup, Ji Gang placed a hand behind his back and said, "I can't sit still, so I'll go over to Yuanzhuo for a look. The medicine is still being decocted. When Chuan-er wakes up later, ask him if he's going out. It's raining so hard. I'll have to tag along."

Fei Sheng voiced his acknowledgment of the request and bowed to send Ji Gang to the walkway. Seeing Ji Gang finally head out, he rushed back while lifting the hem of his robe and whispered close to the door, “Second Master, it’s already the third quarter of the hour of mao. The advisors should arrive later during the hour of chen. Our Lordship—”

The door swooshed open to both sides to reveal Xiao Chiye with a loose robe draped over him. His neck was still flushed and glistening with sweat.

How would Fei Sheng dare to look directly at him? He instantly stepped back and bowed. “Greetings to Second Master.”

In one smooth move, Xiao Chiye took the hot handkerchief on standby at the side and said as he wiped the sweat from his neck. “It’s only the hour of mao and you’re already here, prompting. Your master usually sleeps late, and he’s a light sleeper. How can he withstand you tormenting him like this?”

Fei Sheng responded, “Second Master indeed thinks of everything!”

Xiao Chiye tossed the handkerchief back into the tray. He was just about to say something when he saw Ji Gang, who had just left, return the same way. Ji Gang was already standing at the end of the walkway glaring over at them.

Fei Sheng looked back and inwardly exclaimed, good heavens!

Ji Gang took long strides over. On seeing Ji Gang’s livid expression, Fei Sheng wanted to retreat, but Second Master is watching! So he plucked up his courage and stepped forward bravely to stop Ji Gang. With an apologetic smile, he said, “Did shifu leave something behind? Just send someone over. Why make a special point of walking all the way back? It’s raining so heavily!”

Unable to get around Fei Sheng, Ji Gang grabbed Fei Sheng by the front of his clothes and forcibly lifted Fei Sheng, who was a head taller than him, over to the side.

Xiao Chiye called out, “Shifu...”

“I’m not your shifu!” Ji Gang hollered. Both his hands were trembling. Seeing Xiao Chiye all so wantonly dressed, he hastily took half a step back and pointed at him, sputtering, “How, how dare you. How dare, you!”

He had already sensed something amiss the last time Xiao Chiye asked to be whipped as punishment, but he did not dare to think of Shen Zechuan along those lines, so he tried every means possible to comfort himself. He never expected he would still get slapped with the truth right in the face.

That was Shen Zechuan!

Ji Gang, his back all drenched from the rain, found it preposterous and felt incensed at the same time. His ears buzzed, as if he had really been slapped in the face. Unable to remain steady on his feet, he stood another step back. Fei Sheng reached out to support Ji Gang, but Ji Gang flung his hand away and bellowed, “You know? Were you in the know about it?!”

Fei Sheng forced a smile. “Uh...”

Ji Gang hurled the birdcage down on the ground, and the bird flapped around in alarm as its cage took a few tumbles and rolled to the bottom of the steps.<sup>1</sup> His hands were shaking badly. He still had his strength about him, and a strong wind pounced as he threw out the fist and struck Xiao Chiye with such force that the taste of blood saturated Xiao Chiye’s mouth. Fei Sheng had already lunged over to grab hold of Ji Gang’s arm. “Shifu, please be appeased!”

The rain pitter-pattered down in torrents. Xiao Chiye pressed the tip of his tongue against the taste of blood and said, “I’m willing to take the blows if shifu wants to hit me, and I’m willing to kneel too if shifu wants me to do so. But if shifu is still thinking of finding a marriage match for Lanzhou, then it’s a no-go.”

Ji Gang had been dropping hints this year, not daring to push Shen Zechuan too much, but he had been on tenterhooks, so he had scouted out several maidens in Cizhou and mentioned it to Shen Zechuan in his letters. Shen Zechuan did not agree to any of them and merely said that he had someone to care for him by his side. But Ji Gang had never seen this person ever since he arrived in Duanzhou, and he had been wondering if Shen Zechuan had been merely coaxing him. How could he have expected there to be such a person!

“You scoundrel...” Ji Gang broke his arm free and bellowed agitatedly, “I’m going to beat you scoundrel to death!”

Footnotes

1. Please do not do this at home. No animal abuse :V

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 236 : TWIN JADES

In all the time Ji Gang watched Shen Zechuan grow up, he had never expected Shen Zechuan to become a noble or minister. All he hoped for was for Shen Zechuan to be safe and sound, for things to go smoothly for him, and to have an abundance of children in the future. Anyone could forget that one kick from Xiao Chiye in Qudu, but not Ji Gang, for Shen Zechuan was his one and only remaining son.

It was now Ji Gang recalled those words Xiao Chiye said back in Cizhou. It seemed as if it was all premeditated. This jerk had long planned to show his hand to him. How ludicrous that everyone could see that, and yet there he was, deceiving himself and believing his own lies. He even defended and made excuses for this asshole in every way possible!

Brotherhood? My foot!

Ji Gang threw a few punches at him, but unable to assuage his wrath, he grabbed the horsewhip that had been set at the side and said, “I invited a wolf into the house<sup>1</sup> and believed your lies! You have had designs on Chuan-er a long time back since Cizhou!” His fury grew the more he spoke, and he was, at present, totally oblivious to everything that was good about Xiao Chiye; all he remembered were the old debts. He lashed out with the whip and seethed. “I’ll beat you to death!”

“Shifu, shifu!” How would Fei Sheng dare to let Ji Gang continue striking out at Xiao Chiye? He attempted to persuade, “Second Master’s willingness to accept a beating from shifu means he genuinely intends to tell shifu. This matter doesn't involve outsiders. Let's all sit down in our courtyard and have a proper talk. His Lordship is still waiting for you!"

"Get lost!" Ji Gang bellowed., "All of you are a bunch of scoundrels too!"

The Imperial Bodyguards in this courtyard had all received pointers from Ji Gang before, and they could be considered to be Ji Gang's disciples. So which of them would dare to stop Ji Gang on seeing how fierce he was? What's more, this horsewhip belonged to Xiao Chiye, and it was much heavier than the one in Cizhou. One lash alone felt like an explosion of searing hot pain that seemed to rip one apart.

Ji Gang was really enraged now. It was different from that time in Cizhou. Xiao Chiye's wide-sleeved robe could not block the blows, and every lash drew streaks of blood. Ji Gang whipped with such ferocity that Xiao Chiye sucked in a few gasps of the chilly air.

Seeing Xiao Chiye stubbornly refuse to admit his fault, he hatefully spat, "Whether it goes through or not when I find a marriage match for him is none of your business!"

"No." Xiao Chiye refused to concede when it came to this. He was not willing to speak a single word of falsehood. "There are plenty of decent men in the world. Shen Lanzhou is the one and only one I will not give away to anyone!"

Ji Gang was so incensed he felt dizzy. Pointing the horsewhip at him, he said, "You wanted to kill my son, and now you even want to cut off his bloodline! If you are not going to marry a wife and bear children, why don't you cut yourself off first?!"

The cut-sleeves<sup>2</sup> in Qudu were no secret. Ji Gang had seen his fair share of them when he served as the vice commander of the Imperial Bodyguard. They were inseparable now, deeply attached to each other like glue, but after several years, they all had to marry and have children. Furthermore, Xiao Chiye was Xiao Fangxu's son of legitimate birth. If Xiao Jiming did not take up the mantle on the battlefield, then it would fall upon Xiao Chiye to assume responsibility for it. Once he became the alpha wolf of Libei in the future, whether or not he took a wife would no longer be his own personal affair, but that of the entire Libei Armored Cavalry.

The Xiao clan possessed a 120,000-strong Armored Cavalry. Should the Xiao and Ji households form a marriage alliance between them, it would secure and stabilize the friendship between Zhongbo and Libei. Thus, Ji Gang ought to give the nod in both public and private interests, but this was provided that Xiao Chiye was a maiden. Had that been the case, then even if he was an outwardly brash one who ran hot and cold, Ji Gang would have been willing to accept him, as long as Shen Zechuan wanted him.

“If shifu is willing to agree to it, I’ll get my eldest sister-in-law to come over to propose marriage. If not, I can also marry into the family.” Having been at the receiving end of Xiao Fangxu’s beatings, Xiao Chiye was not in the least bit afraid of these few lashes from Ji Gang. Since Ji Gang wanted to settle the score today, then no matter what he said today, he had to get Ji Gang’s nod.

Ji Gang was so choked speechless that he tilted over backward. Fei Sheng hurriedly supported him. Ji Gang felt that Xiao Chiye was not proposing marriage, but forcing marriage. He had never seen such a self-righteous villain!

With hands on both knees, Xiao Chiye pressed home his attack. “Lanzhou accepted my eldest sister-in-law’s bracelets. He has long been mine, Xiao Ce’an’s! How can shifu find another woman for him? If he really goes to meet her, then he’d be a heartless cad. Shifu wants children, and Ding Tao and Li Xiong are both young; they can relieve your boredom by staying with you. I couldn’t care less if it pleases shifu to raise them until the age of twenty-seven or twenty-eight before marrying them off.”

Ji Gang noted how Xiao Chiye was spouting nonsense in all seriousness. How were Ding Tao and Li Xiong still children? They were already eighteen or nineteen of age. It was considered late now to even throw them out of the house to attend to official duties—this isn’t what it’s about at all!

“Shifu, please give your assent.” Xiao Chiye propped himself with both hands on the floor and kowtowed. “If shifu doesn’t give the nod, I’ll call you father.”

Ji Gang could hold such prestige in the Imperial Bodyguards because he was a reasonable man. For Shen Zechuan, he had put a lot of thought into this matter. Were Xiao Chiye to sit down to reason with Ji Gang, there would be no way he could convince the latter. Shen Zechuan had a bearing on the Libei military grains, so Ji Gang was bound to worry if Libei’s consent now was because of the military grains or the situation.

How in the world would Ji Gang expect Xiao Chiye to be so shameless and thick-skinned to force him into a quandary right outside the door? It would prove hard for him to walk away if he did not give the nod today. Ji Gang squeezed the words through clenched teeth. "Stop trying to dupe me with your sweet words. Even if your eldest sis-in-law really comes, I won't meet her."

"Even so, you have to meet Lanzhou." Xiao Chiye said without raising his head. "Father, Lanzhou is clueless about all these etiquettes. Without you by his side to watch over him, he will be tricked by my eldest sister-in-law back to Libei to be..." Xiao Chiye was momentarily stumped for words, but very quickly, he continued, "... her younger brother-in-law!<sup>3</sup> If you wish to fulfill my wish this way, I'd be happy too."

Ji Gang flung the horsewhip to the ground, driven beyond the limits of his forbearance. "Shut up!" He had to refute Xiao Chiye, so he gritted his teeth and said, "Don't you ever think of marrying into the family!"

Xiao Chiye's robe was slightly opened, and the flush on his neck had faded. Ji Gang refused to let Xiao Chiye enter, and Xiao Chiye did not dispute Ji Gang either. The rain poured in urgent torrents, and it was chilly under the eaves. Ji Gang's fury did not diminish, but the overwhelming rush to his head earlier was gone.

With a solemn expression and a serious countenance, Xiao Chiye said, "All that shifu worries about has crossed my mind too. My eldest brother and sister-in-law have a harmonious relationship. They have Xun-er now, and they will still go on to have children in the future. Libei doesn't need me to beget another child, and I do not have the intention to either. Shifu watched Lanzhou grow up and hopes for him to have a blissful family. I know that, and I wish the same too. Isn't my loving him, respecting him, and living to a ripe old age with him bliss too? Shifu can't trust me and fears that Lanzhou will suffer an aggrievement in the future, so you want to find Lanzhou a woman. It's indeed not my place to interfere, but I've already given him this life of mine. His wanting of another person is akin to killing me."

Xiao Chiye was no ordinary man. He had both the courage and means. They might now be a pair of twin jades who seemed to get along swimmingly, but what would happen when the war was over? If he had a change of heart, he had plenty of ways to end this relationship. What Ji Gang feared the most was Shen Zechuan being all alone by his lonesome self after his passing. Everyone addressed Shen Zechuan with the honorific address of the Prefectural Lord right now. It was only to Ji Gang that Shen Zechuan was Chuan-er; there was still much for him to worry about.

Ji Gang did not dare to make this wager. He could not trust Xiao Chiye.

For a long time, Xiao Chiye did not get an answer. He heard the approaching sound of wooden clogs behind him and slightly turned his head sideways to see a properly attired Shen Zechuan with his fan in hand sneaking a glance at him.

“No.” Ji Gang seemed to answer Xiao Chiye, although he was looking at Shen Zechuan, his aged face weathered and worn as he decisively concluded, “It’s not going to happen.”

Yao Wenyu was in the midst of lighting incense in the courtyard next door. He clutched the incense stick between his fingers, its fumes so intense that Hunu was unwilling to get close to him. Once the rain these two days came to a stop, mosquitos ought to be making their presence known. Yao Wenyu could not stand this scent either. He was just scrutinizing the incense when it was taken away from him.

Qiao Tianya brought the incense to his nose for a sniff. He wrinkled his nose and said, “This smell is too strong. Where is it from? Send it back to the sender for their own use.”

“It’s from the merchants.” Yao Wenyu turned his wheelchair to face the courtyard. “The Tathagata incense from the City of Liuzhou sells for an exorbitant amount in Juexi.”

Qiao Tianya pinched the incense to extinguish it. “Reeks of stinky tofu.”

“The folks of Liuzhou have a taste for stinky tofu.” Yao Wenyu lifted a hand to wave away the smell. “Remind Fei Sheng later not to light up this incense in His Lordship’s room.”

Feeling as if Yao Wenyu was avoiding him, Qiao Tianya jammed a wheelchair wheel with his foot and said. “You couldn’t have seen him more than a few times, so how are you on familiar terms with him now?”

“We all attend to official duties for His Lordship.” Yao Wenyu paused for a moment and turned his head aside to look at Qiao Tianya. “There’s no unfamiliarity to speak of.”

Qiao Tianya was originally in good spirits, but his smile gradually dimmed under the exchange of gazes between him and Yao Wenyu. Yao

Wenyu had never been willing to look Qiao Tianya in the eyes before. He would dodge him out of shame, as if his embarrassing predicament at night was always at the forefront of his mind. But now, he was frank and open, as if he was still that piece of unpolished jade that had never been tainted by the slightest hint of desire.

No unfamiliarity to speak of.

Qiao Tianya was no different from Fei Sheng, Kong Ling, and everyone else whom Yao Wenyu had met. He was no longer that secret and special one. With a flick of his sleeves, Yao Wenyu could revert to being a banished immortal.<sup>4</sup>

"It's raining heavily today. If you are not in a hurry, take your meal first before you step out. Chengfeng and Youjing are coming in the afternoon, and it's also time to report on the matter of the Imperial Cavalry. See if you want to discuss it with them before heading out." As Yao Wenyu spoke, he looked at the wheel of the wheelchair before looking at Qiao Tianya again. "You're blocking it."

His smile was thin, as if resigned but at the same time, self-deprecating.

"Being a cripple who can still skirt around obstacles is not something I can do. Don't make fun of me."

The wind struck against the wind chimes, and a few drops of rain splattered on the thin blanket. Qiao Tianya shifted his leg away. He had always handled himself with ease, and yet he cut a sorry figure under Yao Wenyu's gaze.

Yao Wenyu turned his wheelchair and entered the room. The wheels thumped against the floor, emitting a string of even noise. He pushed the wheelchair, exposing his wrist amid his movements. It still had Qiao Tianya's red thread around it. As he moved, his wide sleeve bunched up, and the thread, thus covered, vanished among the cloud of white.

Ji Gang was resting his head on an arm with his face to the wall, looking as if he was asleep.

Shen Zechuan set his folding fan at the edge of the bed and asked, "Is shifu asleep?"

Ji Gang opened his eyes. "You know shifu is already asleep, and yet you ask."

Just like the time he was young, Shen Zechuan pulled the chair closer and said, “After I left Zhaozui Temple, I’ve never have had an all-night chat with shifu.”

“You came tonight for a man.” Ji Gang paused, unable to vent that fury on Shen Zechuan. It dissipated in his chest, replaced by another kind of self-reproach and sorrow. “What’s so good about him? Your teacher and I both won’t agree.”

“Teacher praised him before.” Shen Zechuan spoke softly. “A ‘natural-born talent’ is exactly what Teacher said to me.”

“Can a prodigious talent bring domestic peace to his family?” Ji Gang sat up and looked at Shen Zechuan. “A prodigious talent has to have the empire in his sights. Are you willing to sit in the same seat as him in the future?”

Shen Zechuan’s expression was docile as he lowered his eyes and said, “That’s not for me to say.”

Ji Gang heaved a long sigh under the candlelight. After a long time, he bitterly said, “When the Grand Mentor asked you how you are going to exercise self-restraint when you have the Imperial Bodyguards in your grasp, I ought to have realized that it was not a question for a student. Who in the world can hold the Imperial Bodyguards in their control? The Grand Mentor hid it from everyone and taught you too much. You are such a good learner, so do you not understand? The twin jades that form a pair today will be the two tigers that fight for power in the future.”

It was not that Xiao Chiye was mediocre, but that he was too outstanding, so much that Ji Gang could not set his mind at ease.

“If I were a man of use,” the expression in Ji Gang’s eyes was complicated as he gazed at Shen Zechuan, “and if your brother were still alive, then there’s no harm in staking your bets on him, but I am old and useless. After my passing, you will have to face everyone in this world alone. It will be just you, so how can I feel reassured?”

Footnotes

1. 引狼入室 literally invited a wolf into the house, i.e., open the door to a dangerous foe, bring disaster upon oneself.
2. 断袖 i.e., homosexual

3. Specifically, the husband of her younger brother.
4. 谪仙 literally, an immortal who has been banished from heaven to live on earth; an epithet for exceptional individuals such as the Tang poet Li Bai (who also wrote the poem, Qiang Jin Jiu). i.e., a wayward genius

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 237: HEIR

The rain in the courtyard came to a halt. Moonlight was late to come, and so it was dim in the room.

Shen Zechuan's slightly lowered eyes lay concealed in the darkness. He looked like a moored travel-weary traveler riding out the long, endless tide of the night. When he looked at Ji Gang again, it was with a gaze he had never shown before, as if he had stripped off the skin named Prefectural Lord, leaving behind only a stretch of moonlight.

"Without shifu and Ce'an, I am still me. Only that it won't be me who fears everyone in the world, but everyone who fears me. Shen Wei's blood runs in me. I have no need for heirs."

Ji Gang's heart ached so much he nearly shed tears. "You are my son," he said.

"I'm shifu's son, but my name is Shen Zechuan. Teacher imparted the classics to me, yet I'm not an emperor."

Emperor.

The most supreme being of this world who stood at the very top and overlooked the world – if not a royal crown or official headgear bearer – was the emperor. The emperor must not only be versed in the political art of checks and balances, but also possess the broad-mindedness to accommodate the common people. Emperors in the flourishing eras that had the support of their people were all unparalleled men of benevolence. Shen Zechuan had in his eyes a storm that was building up. He was the sudden downpour that swept through the mountains and rivers of the country, and the sharp blade that shredded heaven and earth to pieces, but he was not an emperor who ushered in a golden era of prosperity.

“Libei has a 120,000-strong Armored Cavalry; it’s a cinch for their horses to set foot into Zhongbo, but Ce’an gave me his lifeblood. I have his horses, and his elder brother’s grains. He’s willing to leave the fields of Libei and ride his horse in my Duanzhou. Shifu, he’s not afraid of my Garrison Troops, and I am not afraid of his Armored Cavalry. One day, I will hold captive the ‘deer’ the Li clan cast away,<sup>1</sup> and Ce’an will hold me captive. The sun and the moon have coexisted in Heaven and Earth for tens of thousands of years without going at each other’s throats. This is the stability the world looks forward to. We are the equilibrium.”

The blazing sun and the luminous moon!

The cessation of the war heralded the beginning of another battle. No sovereign could tolerate their co-existence in the east. It was only when Xiao Chiye and Shen Zechuan were together that Libei and Zhongbo would be able to get the opportunity to rest and rebuild.

Shen Zechuan gave his tacit consent when Xiao Jiming built a riding stable on Mount Luo. This was his concession to Libei, and also the opportunity he gave to Libei. The bridle paths that Zhongbo was building would break the boundary between both lands, and when they merged into one, they would become a behemoth entrenched in the northeast.

Ji Gang sat cross-legged in silence. “He’s well-trained in the Ji Clan’s Boxing Fist, and comes and goes freely. What’s there to fear? Even so, you and he have no heirs. As long as this matter is left hanging in the air, Libei and Zhongbo can’t last for long.”

Xiao Chiye put on his armor and waited in the room for Shen Zechuan to return. The sound of wheels rose from under the eaves. Fei Sheng lifted the hanging screen for Yao Wenyu and said, “His Lordship is not yet back.”

The thin blanket on Yao Wenyu’s knees was a little damp. Propping himself up on his wheelchair, he said, “I’m looking for Second Master.”

Fei Sheng felt a little put on the spot. Xiao Chiye announced from within, “I’m here.”

Yao Wenyu graciously declined Fei Sheng’s offer of help and turned his wheelchair around to enter himself. Xiao Chiye retracted his legs, sat up straight at the table, and set the military book aside next to his hand. “What can I do for you, Yuanzhuo?”

“Rarely do I get the chance to see Second Master. There are some things that aren’t convenient to bring up in letters, so I can only discuss them face to face.” Yao Wenyu took out his handkerchief and wiped the sweat on his hands. “Is Second Master free?”

Xiao Chiye leaned back. “What matter is there that you have to bypass Lanzhou to discuss with me?”

Yao Wenyu wiped his hands clean and folded the handkerchief before putting it back into place in his sleeves. He was in no hurry. Under the incessant sound of rain, he said, “It concerns Libei. Naturally, it’s more appropriate for me to discuss it with Second Master. Now that the Empress Dowager has suffered a setback in Qudu, Xue Yanqing’s next move will be to remove Han Cheng’s military power. When the time comes for the Heir Apparent to ascend to the throne, he will have her confer Qidong a title in order to secure Commander-in-chief Qi and keep her from interfering with his plans. Does Second Master still intend to keep the appointment to head down to the Bianjun Commandery?”

Of course Xiao Chiye had to go. The trip to the Bianjun Commandery would determine whether or not Hasen’s surprise attack on Duanzhou would succeed. Besides, he trusted Qi Zhuyin.

Yao Wenyu got his answer from Xiao Chiye’s silence. Changing the topic, he said, “The Grandson-Heir...” Given that Xiao Jiming had inherited Xiao Fangxu’s noble title, Xiao Xun ought to be called the Hereditary Prince now, so he corrected himself and continued, “Does the Hereditary Prince have a teacher to impart him elementary knowledge in Dajing?”

Xiao Chiye tapped his index finger neutrally on the table. “You wish to teach Xun-er.”

Xiao Chiye was quite a perceptive man. He had an inkling of Yao Wenyu’s intent from the latter’s change of topic. Xue Xiuzhuo’s heir apparent was about to ascend to the throne, and they were going to confer a noble title upon Qi Zhuyin too. By the time the war with Biansha was over, they might part ways with Qi Zhuyin. Shen Zechuan had his eyes on seizing Qudu, and Yao Wenyu was already considering the issue of heirs.

“Our wolves from Libei,” Xiao Chiye raised his head slightly and said in a quiet voice, “will not be emperors.”

Xiao Chiye and Shen Zechuan had no children, so their intent in having Xiao Xun come to Zhongbo to receive the teachings of Yao Wenyu and the rest was clear to Xiao Chiye—Xiao Xun was to be Shen Zechuan’s successor. This matter was too good a deal for Libei, so much that Xiao Chiye was not inclined to agree.

“Second Master has His Lordship’s interests in mind and so is unwilling to let the Xiao clan take His Lordship’s place. But even if it were another child and not the Hereditary Prince, said child would not go by the surname Shen either,” Yao Wenyu said to Xiao Chiye. “His Lordship would never let Shen Wei’s name enter the ancestral temple.”

Shen Zechuan wanted Shen Wei to continue as a wandering soul in the wilderness of Dunzhou, so giving him a place in the ancestral temple to receive offerings and incense was totally out of the question. What he wanted to choke off was the Shen clan’s bloodline.

Xiao Chiye said, “Xun-er is the Hereditary Prince of Libei. My eldest brother will never agree to this.”

After a moment of silence, Yao Wenyu changed his tone into a conversational one between friends. “Do you have another option?”

The rain of the night pitter-pattered down, and it was not at all cold in the room. Yao Wenyu, however, did not look too good.

“There are countless heroes in the world. Know why I came all the way from afar to Zhongbo and threw in my lot with Lanzhou?”

Xiao Chiye’s eyes were dark and deep.

Yao Wenyu was not afraid of Xiao Chiye. As long as he could finish this game of chess, he did not fear anyone. He continued, “I watched him flee with you northward, only to stop in Zhongbo. I thought he wanted to clear Shen Wei’s name, but he did not care about that at all. He did not treat Zhongbo as his homeland, nor treat Qudu as his refuge. Advance and retreat all hinge on just one thought of his. I know he is not the man to be an emperor, but I still wanted to assist him, because he is a natural-born overlord. Your father knew Zhongbo was on a rapid rise to power and prominence. He granted Shen Zechuan’s entry into Libei, because Xiao Xun is Shen Zechuan’s one and only option.”

Xiao Fangxu was the King of Wolves who established the Great Territories of Libei—Dajing. He could catch a whiff of Emperor Guangcheng’s desire standing on Luoxia Pass, and at the most appropriate timing, he became a conferred prince<sup>2</sup> of Dazhou to hold a massive military force in his hand. He was far more visionary than his sons. Shen Zechuan had only one future. Without Xiao Chiye and Xiao Xun, he would never have allowed Shen Zechuan to return to Zhongbo alive.

“Since Lanzhou dares to head towards that position,” Xiao Chiye enunciated each word, “it’s his.”

“It’s his,” Yao Wenyu said, “but only if he has Xiao Xun.”

Xiao Chiye did not answer under the pattering sound of the rain.

The Heir Apparent found the night to be cold. She had not been sleeping well after her bout of illness and was often startled awake. At present, she was looking at the roof with open eyes, hanging in there until the hour of mao before she rolled over and got up without even needing the palace maids to call her.

The palace maids were all newcomers. They kneeled as they straightened out the hem of Li Jianting’s robes, and when Li Jianting sat before the mirror, they held the jewelry case in hand to tidy up her hair. During this period of time, Li Jianting had lost a lot of weight, and she looked increasingly sharp and stern, with not a trace of a woman’s delicateness and gentleness.

Li Jianting had not slept well, and she was also just recovering from a major illness, so she was inevitably tired. In her trance, she felt a coolness on her ear. Before the palace maid who was leaning over to put on earrings for the Heir Apparent could react, the Heir Apparent jerked to her feet noisily with a ghastly pale complexion. Restraining herself, Li Jianting reprimanded in an undertone, “Take it away!”

The palace maids in the palace all kneeled down in a fluster, not knowing what they had done to incur the Heir Apparent’s displeasure.

Li Jianting pursed her lips into a tight line and, amid the dead silence, saw her blurred figure in the mirror. She stared at this self of hers for a long time. “I don’t wear earrings when I’m receiving lessons from the various gentlemen in the front hall.”

The palace maids kowtowed a few times and answered in timid voices.

Not requiring their assistance anymore, Li Jianting put on her overcoat herself. Those precious and valuable materials covered her on the outside, like her own suit of armor. She felt better, but still did not speak. When she stepped out of the door, she saw a familiar figure under the eaves.

Fuman stepped forth to open up the umbrella for Li Jianting. Fawning on her, he said, “It’s raining so heavily today. This humble slave has prepared a sedan for Your Highness. Your Highness can take a nap. This humble slave will call you when we arrive before the hall. I'll make sure not to hold up matters."

Li Jianting did not move. She smiled and asked, "Good morning, gonggong. You must be busy investigating the case, aren't you?"

Fuman did not dare to rush her either. "How would this humble slave know how to investigate a case? It's all at the Grand Secretary's advice. He specifically sent a few excellencies from the Ministry of Justice to supervise."

What he meant was that he was not the sole person passing judgment on the case, since it all went through Kong Qiu, so it had nothing much to do with him.

Without blinking her eyes, Li Jianting said, "So Fengquan can't be released?"

Fuman switched tactics and started to put on a worried look. "He's Lady Mu's brother, and he has connections with the Garden Service. The Ministry of Justice is ill-advised to bend the law to release him. This humble slave made several successive trips to the office compound and has also mentioned to the Grand Secretary that he's a good man."

Fuman reckoned that Fengquan's return to serve in the palace must have been because he had attended to the Heir Apparent for a long time and had built up a bond between master and servant. So he did not slander Fengquan before Li Jianting; he knew that Li Jianting was still partial to Fengquan. At any rate, he had plenty of time in the future. As long as he maintained this position, Li Jianting would sooner or later get tired of Fengquan.

Li Jianting said, "I've been sick, and have not received any message either. What exactly is going on?"

Fuman held up the umbrella for Li Jianting while he stood in the rain. "Just investigat—ay, Your Highness, please watch your feet. The steps here are slippery. Let this humble slave hold you! The issue with this case lies in the food. This humble slave and the Ministry of Justice checked Your Highness's meals that day, and the Garden Service prove to be the most problematic of all. The people there are a mixed bag, with people harboring ulterior motives lying low among them."

He downplayed his role in this case and let the Ministry of Department that had been supervising assume full responsibility. So if Fengquan were to die, it would be Kong Qiu's problem. The Grand Secretary was her teacher who decided whether or not she could ascend to the throne. Even if Li Jianting was displeased, she could not get angry with Kong Qiu.

Li Jianting originally did not plan to get into the sedan chair, but she changed her mind at the last minute and bent over to enter. In high spirits, Fuman called out to Her Highness to slow down, then he tucked in the hanging screen of the sedan for Li Jianting and urged the sedan-bearing eunuchs to hurry towards Mingli Hall. By the time Li Jianting arrived at Mingli Hall, Cen Yu had already been waiting a long time. Standing under the eaves, he saw Li Jianting coming down from the sedan and could not help but furrow his brows.

The Heir Apparent had never been one for these before. That was how she could get into the good graces of the ministers. How was it that the moment the Empress Dowager fell from grace, she could not even walk even a few steps anymore?

Cen Yu paid his obeisances to Li Jianting, who stood under the eaves and returned the greetings. Cen Yu did not enter the hall immediately, but said with solemn deference, “Rain in spring is as precious as oil. The fertile farmlands of the eight cities are all affected by this rain. Your Highness has yet to ascend to the throne, and has no title to your name, so how can you ride a sedan in the palace?”

As if enlightened, Li Jianting gathered her sleeves in apology and said, “This student has realized the error of her ways.”

Fuman had been following behind when he heard this. How could he let the Heir Apparent bear the blame? He was the one who arranged for the sedan, so he hurriedly said, “Her Highness has just recovered from a major illness, and her esteemed health is precious. What’s more, this rain is so heavy...”

Cen Yu’s countenance abruptly changed. He bellowed, “Her Highness and I are in the midst of conversation as student and teacher. How dare a eunuch interrupt!”

Bemoaning his blunder, Fuman immediately kneeled and kowtowed. “This humble slave, this humble slave...”

To think that in his anxiety, he had violated the taboo between the eunuchs and court ministers!

Cen Yu and Kong Qiu were both people who had been through the undermining and corruption of state politics by the Pan faction, so it was with a passion that they hated palace eunuchs meddling in governmental affairs. Fuman usually moved around in the office compound, and his merit lay in the fact that he was willing to play dumb and would never butt in. He had just arrived to serve the Heir Apparent today, and already, Cen Yu could see how he dared to arrange for a sedan and butt into their conversation. If he allowed him to remain for a few more days, wouldn't that lead to an absolute collapse of order?!

"Since you dare to break the Heir Apparent's habit today, then you will dare to mess with the Heir Apparent's court administration in the future!" Cen Yu was flushed with anger. "The audacity of you, castrated crook!"

Fuman kowtowed until his forehead was adorned with new bruises overlapping old bruises.

Li Jianting piped up, "It was my fault, Teacher..."

Cen Yu promptly said, "Your Highness is the Heir Apparent. The sovereign ought to keep his distance from the crafty sycophants! Men, strip him of his covering and drag him away!"

Fuman was a eunuch of the Directorate of Ceremonial. According to the rules during the reign of Yongyi, Cen Yu must never bellow and order him around like this. Hearing the guards' footsteps, both of Fuman's hands trembled as he shuffled towards Li Jianting on his knees and pleaded, "This humble slave deserves death! This humble slave..."

The guards stripped Fuman without so much a word and dragged him to the open space in front of Mingli Hall. Rain poured down over them. Fuman kneeled in the middle, his lips turning blue from the freezing cold.

Cen Yu commanded, "Slap his mouth!"

A guard lifted the hem of his robe and stood before Fuman to give him a slap with such force that Fuman's left ear rang. He did not dare to dodge or yell. Without giving the order to stop, Cen Yu turned around to lift the hanging screen and motioned for Li Jianting to enter, leaving Fuman out cold in the open space.

The sound of slapping never stopped.

Footnotes

1. From the quote "Qin lost his deer, and all under heaven chased after it" 「秦失其鹿，天下共逐之」 from Records of the Grand Historian • Biography of Marquis Huaiyin 《史记·淮阴侯列传》. Deer is a metaphor for the throne. It's an illustration of the rise of numerous rivaling warlords contesting for supremacy to capture the prize, the empire lost by the Qin Dynasty.

2. 异姓王 Specifically princes, or lords, with different surnames from the imperial family These were conferred princes who were bestowed the title by the Emperor.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 238 : BURNING (WITH ANXIETY)

No one was called to serve in Mingli Hall at this time. Cen Yu lowered the hanging screen and led Li Jianting to a seat. Resuming his usual expression, he said, “I shouldn’t have asked Your Highness to come over while Your Highness is still ill, but this is a matter of urgency, and I had no choice but to rush Your Highness into coming.”

Li Jianting took her seat and said, “Please go ahead and speak your mind, Teacher.”

Feeling uneasy and apprehensive, Cen Yu listened to the continuing sound of slaps outside and cautiously lifted the bamboo blinds by the window. Only when he was certain no one else was around that he said to Li Jianting, “The case of the Dancheng field taxes is about to be concluded soon. It implicates many a number of officials. Liang Cuishan has already started to audit the City of Chuancheng field taxes, and next up will be the Hua Clan of the City of Dicheng. Your Highness is alone in the palace, and us humble subjects are all on edge with anxiety.”

The rear palace of the imperial harem was a forbidden zone, and court ministers were all not permitted to enter. Li Jianting had only just gotten poisoned a while back, and the Grand Secretariat was worried that the Empress Dowager would be driven to take desperate action and hold the life of the Heir Apparent hostage against them.

The sides of Li Jianting’s snow-white cheeks were covered with a velvet collar. She frowned slightly, the flower embellishment between her brows moving slightly in response to the movement. “We are now at the critical juncture with the conclusion of the City of Dancheng field taxes and field surveyance. There mustn't be any delay. The various teachers need not slow down the process for my sake. Just go by the book."

Cen Yu used to be prejudiced against Li Jianting, but the Heir Apparent had a dignified bearing and she was a keen learner to boot. She deferentially addressed them all as "Teachers", and now she was even willing to put her life on the line for the commoners' fields. Emotions welled up in Cen Yu, and he lifted the hem of his robe to kneel to Li Jianting. As he kowtowed, he said with an indistinct sob, "Your Highness... this is really... too aggravating an injustice for Your Highness!"

Li Jianting got out and lightly helped Cen Yu up. "Teacher, please get up quickly."

Cen Yu wiped his tears with his sleeves. "Your Highness, please look out for your safety in the palace. If the Empress Dowager dares to coerce Your Highness, we will undoubtedly fight with our lives."

Li Jianting sighed with deep feeling. "I'm not deserving of it. But Teacher, the Marquis of Helian of Chuancheng is an old family friend of the Han clan of Wucheng. This is a perilous task to undertake."

Seeing Li Jianting being so frank with himself, Cen Yu remembered Han Cheng and could not help feeling sorrowful. As court officials, they boasted themselves of being ministers loyal to the state, and yet they left the Heir Apparent stranded in the palace, leading each day in imminent danger of death. Tears streamed down his aged eyes as he said, "Han Cheng has the Capital Command Troops in his control... We do not dare to act arbitrarily. It has been hard on Your Highness."

"Han Cheng's squandering of public funds is common knowledge among the imperial court and common folks. What's more, he's narrow-minded and unwilling to tolerate others. Teacher is the one being put on the spot. The Eight Great Training Divisions, as the Capital Command Troops, have been sticking to their old ways in recent years and accomplished nothing ever since the reign of Xiande when Xi Gu'an was still around." Li Jianting slowed down at this point. "The Capital Command Troops and the Empress Dowager share a common lot. It's indeed tough if the various Teachers wish to take disciplinary action against Han Cheng."

Cen Yu did not expect the Heir Apparent to see through it so clearly, thus he said, "Commander-in-chief Qi is still in Qudu now, and the Qidong Garrison Troops are just beyond the city gate. The situation is already at a point where there is no time to lose. Us humble subjects have to remove Han Cheng as soon as possible.”

Li Jianting said, “Commander-in-chief Qi is here to accompany Eldest Madam Qi home for a visit, so there are only a few thousand Garrison Troops in the entourage. If they were really to come to blows, I’m afraid Qidong would be too late to come to the rescue, and Qudu would be in a dangerous situation.”

The Eight Great Training Divisions had 20,000 soldiers. Not only were they familiar with the streets of Qudu, they also controlled the opening and closing of the city gate. What’s more, Han Cheng had the Imperial Bodyguards to be his informants. He could keep an eye on Qi Zhuyin’s movements at all times. Half a month had already passed since the day at the prison when Qi Zhuyin obscured the facts and deceived Han Cheng. Han Cheng should have already realized it by now.

Li Jianting stood up and saw Fuman still getting slapped through the gap in the bamboo blinds. Her expression remained unchanged, but the gaze in her eyes was cold and indifferent. Her tone towards Cen Yu, however, was still mild and gentle. “I have a plan that can remove Han Cheng.”

“Your Highness, please go on,” Cen Yu promptly said.

“The inner court has been just like an ornament after the reign of Xiande. Han Cheng is complacent and full of himself now that the Eastern Depot is empty,” Li Jianting said. “To remove Han Cheng, we need to have the assistance of the palace eunuchs.”<sup>1</sup>

The color drained from Cen Yu’s face as he said in horror, “The Pan faction undermined court politics for a mere ten years, and they ruined court discipline to such an extent. The Secretariat Elder did his utmost in order to get the inner court to relinquish power. Your Highness, these castrated eunuchs must never be used!”

“Wrong, Teacher.” Li Jianting turned around and said to Cen Yu, “The corruption of state politics by the eunuch clique is, in truth, the fault of the Son of Heaven. These palace eunuchs are the domestic slaves of the Son of Heaven. They can be used, but not entrusted with heavy responsibility.”

Li Jianting was taught by Xue Xiuzhuo, so she was very familiar with the Pan faction during the reign of Yongyi to the reign of Xiande. Like Kong Qiu, Cen Yu, and the rest of the Grand Secretariat ministers, she had misgivings about the palace eunuchs. But being a minister and being a sovereign were two separate matters. The forces around authority and power were just like the surge of undercurrents. They were impossible to eradicate clean, and only by using them would one be able to hold them in check.

“The Hanshi Festival<sup>2</sup> is right around the corner. As usual, the palace has to host a banquet for its officials. The time when Han Cheng removes his blade and enters,” Li Jianting raised her hand to pull off the golden hairpin in her hair, “is the time to act.”

As the commander of the Imperial Bodyguards-cum-viceroy of the Eight Great Training Divisions, Han Cheng had the right to carry his blade with him when he came and went. But during the reign of Tianchen when Li Jianheng met with an assassination attempt, an exception was made for Shen Zechuan to become Li Jianheng’s guard. The authority to carry blades was then split apart, and the blade-bearing guards during banquets were all personally appointed by the emperor himself. Now that Dazhou had no emperor, Han Cheng had to attend the banquet without his blade.

Cen Yu looked at that golden hairpin. The fingers holding the golden hairpin were slender and pale from having resided indoors for a long time. The Heir Apparent had gotten so thin after this illness that her bones were prominent, and her wrist, which lay covered under the brocade, exuded toughness.

Cen Yu lifted the hem of his robe and prostrated over the ground, sobbing. “Han Cheng is well-versed in martial arts. What are we to do if he gets violent in the face of danger and hurts Your Highness?!”

“Commander-in-chief Qi won a battle at the Bianjun Commandery in spring. The Grand Secretary can grant her a seat at the feast as a commendation. Han Cheng is the viceroy of the Capital Command Troops. Let him sit side by side with Commander-in-chief Qi.” Li Jianting had given this matter careful deliberations. “Have Fuman and Fengquan lead the palace eunuchs. As long as Han Cheng strides through the palace gate, there will be no return for him.”

It was when Cen Yu listened to this point that he truly got a feel of just how formidable the Heir Apparent was!

The rivalry between Fuman and Fengquan began as early as Emperor Tianchen’s time. Fuman’s placing of Fengquan in the forefront of his investigation this time was precisely to eliminate those who opposed him. He wanted to climb to the top of the inner court and become the Seal-holding Director of the Directorate of Ceremonial after Li Jianting’s ascension to the throne. This person was adept in the art of flattery and had repeatedly changed sides several times. If they were to put him on his own, then it only took a change in the situation and for Han Cheng to entice him with benefits for him to possibly ruin matters. Li Jianting returned Fengquan to his place beside her because Fengquan would never work in cahoots with Fuman after his imprisonment this time. Their mutual misgivings about the other would keep them in mutual check. In fact, they might even continue to pit against each other in order to win the Heir Apparent's trust.

Han Cheng had the military seal of the Capital Command Troops and the authority token of the Imperial Bodyguards on him. Once he died, the Eight Great Training Divisions and Imperial Bodyguards would both be thrown into chaos, and the crisis in Qudu would be easily averted. But if Han Cheng were to attend the banquet without his blade, he would leave his trusted Imperial Bodyguards outside the hall. The time in which they were able to kill him was rather short. Should they fail, then once he issued the call for action, the court officials inside the hall would be in imminent danger.

"This matter has to be carefully planned by Teacher and the Grand Secretary. Not a word of it must get out." Saying so, Li Jianting partially bent over to help Cen Yu up. "Success or failure hinges on this one move."

The frigid wind abruptly swept up the bamboo blinds. Cen Yu met Li Jianting's eyes and gave a severe nod of his head as he answered in a deep, quiet voice, "We will not fail Your Highness for your overwhelming benevolence!"

Meanwhile, Fuman, who was in the rain, had been slapped until both his ears had temporarily gone deaf. Blood was trickling out of the corners of his mouth. He was weeping when he saw Cen Yu stride through the door and watched him with a frosty expression. Dazed, he pleaded, "This humble slave has realized the errors of my ways. Your Excellency, Your Excellency..."

Cen Yu dusted off his sleeves and said, "If not for Your Highness' benevolence, I would not let you off tonight. Forget it. You may take your leave."

The guards withdrew back and returned to stand at attention under the eaves of Mingli hall.

Fuman shifted forward on his knees and repeatedly kowtowed at Cen Yu. "It is as Your Excellency lectured. This humble slave dare not commit such a mistake again."

Li Jianting lifted the hanging screen and stepped out to see the wretched sight of Fuman's face stained with tears and snot. As she lowered her sleeves, she said, "You may leave. Clean up and put on a fresh set of robes. Wait in attendance before the courtyard."

Fuman raised his arm to wipe at the tears on his face. With eyes on Li Jianting's shoes, he kowtowed a few more times. "This humble slave shall do as you command."

As Fuman got to his feet, he hastily bundled up his soaking wet robe. Through the pouring rain, he saw no sign of disdain on the Heir Apparent's face, only a faint hint of compassion.

Kong Qiu dared not make it public as he went about the preparations; all of their discussions took place in their personal residences. They did not gather in groups, but instead used visitation cards to make individual visits. The rain came and went, and in the blink of an eye, it was the Hanshi festival.

Fengquan had been recuperating in recent days after having been tortured in prison. Today, he was helping the Heir Apparent affix her flower embellishment. He bowed over in front of the mirror, revealing the marks of torture on his wrist when he lifted his arm.

Li Jianting did not shut her eyes. She watched Fengquan, as if scrutinizing him.

Fengquan's hand trembled slightly under Li Jianting's gaze and almost affixed the flower embellishment in the wrong spot. Li Jianting held Fengquan's wrist with her fingers and guided the flower embellishment back to the center of her forehead.

"What did the physician say over the last few days?"

Fengquan listened to the sound of the breeze stirred up by the palace maids' movements. Avoiding Li Jianting's gaze, he answered. "My gratitude for Your Highness' concern. The physician said that there's no major issue."

Li Jianting got to her feet, and the palace maid in attendance behind her helped to put on her outer robe. Li Jianting turned her head aside to look at herself in the mirror. She always seemed to be staring at herself in the mirror, as if she was searching for something.

“Update me on the details concerning the Garden Service after the banquet.” Li Jianting adjusted the golden hairpiece by her temples and turned towards the entrance of her palace, no longer looking at that reflection.

Fengquan understood and intuitively stepped forward to support Li Jianting.

Li Jianting took a few steps forward and stepped onto the light on the ground. She lowered her eyes to look at that light. The polished floor reflected the sky outside, making it seem as if she was standing amidst the clouds, and it was at this moment that she was strangely childlike as she stood there for a long time, as though she was reluctant to part from this scene.

Fuman, who was outside, bowed as he walked up the steps and waited by the entrance, saying softly, “Your Highness, it’s time.”

Fengquan felt his shoulders sink slightly. The breeze after the rain swayed the golden hairpin by the Heir Apparent’s temple. The butterfly spun around in a circle and bumped lightly into her coiffed, bound-up hair.<sup>3</sup>

Li Jianting strode out.

Han Cheng rode a carriage to the palace gate, where he saw the Marquis of Helian when he dismounted. The Marquis of Helian had been waiting a long time. When he saw Han Cheng coming over, he hurriedly went up to greet him and headed into the palace with him side by side. “Why have you been turning a blind eye these days? The Chief Surveillance Bureau is impeaching me now, saying that I have forcibly occupied the commoners’ fields. Isn’t this just using a lie to start a fight?!”

Twirling the walnuts in his hand, Han Cheng said, “Tell that to Cen Yu. Do you think he will be willing to believe that? Now that he has the accounts Pan Lin gave him in his hands, he has an estimation of the eight cities’ field taxes.”

“Then we have to think of a way.” The Marquis of Helian followed close behind Han Cheng and spoke in an undertone, “They want to confine the Empress Dowager. I can’t even get to see her now.”

Han Cheng felt that the Empress Dowager herself was a clay Buddha crossing the river; she could not even save herself, let alone others. The accounts had already been pursued all the way to the city of Chuancheng. Looking at Kong Qiu and the others' stance of fighting to their last breath, they would not stop and let the matter drop like they had in the past. For this matter, he had been having sleepless nights. Stroking his growing beard, he said, "I'm anxious too, but will being anxious help matters?" He cast a glance at the eunuch leading the way in front and whispered to the Marquis of Helian, "The Heir Apparent fell ill but turned up fine. What can we do about that?"

"What kind of loyal and righteous thing is Fuman?" The Marquis of Helian walked fast, sweating slightly. "Eunuchs like them don't recognize the words loyalty and righteousness. And given the type of poison 'swift pursuit' is? I don't believe a word he says at all. He must have tampered with it, not daring to offend the Grand Secretariat. Isn't he now serving by the Heir Apparent's side? They are all a low-down bunch."

Seeing as they were about to arrive at their destination, Han Cheng tucked the walnuts under the robe on his bosom at the same time the eunuch withdrew. He gave a slight nod to the guard and said to the Marquis of Helian, "Follow me to my residence for a discussion after the banquet. This is not the place to talk with so many eyes around here."

The Marquis of Helian was burning with anxiety, but he had no choice other than to acquiesce and follow right on Han Cheng's heels into the hall.

Footnotes

1. Refer to Author's Note in chapter 7, the Eastern Depot run by the eunuchs and the Imperial Bodyguards are rivals that sort of hold each other in check.
2. 寒食节 Cold Food Festival, or Hanshi Festival; the day before the Qingming Festival when people eat only cold food.
3. 云髻 hair rolled up into a bun/coil at the top of the head

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 239 : JIANING

Particular attention was paid to the seating arrangements during the Hanshi Festival. When Han Cheng took his seat, he saw Qi Zhuyin to his left. He held up his sleeves and asked, “When is Commander-in-chief Qi going to return to Qidong? The rain of Qingming<sup>1</sup> comes and goes so abruptly that it makes traveling on the bridle path tough.”

The eunuch next to Qi Zhuyin was in the midst of pouring wine. The wine vessels of the palace were all classy and of top quality, and they were a pretty sight to behold when filled with amber-colored wine. Qi Zhuyin rotated the wine cup and answered as she scrutinized it, “The Bianjun Commandery has been pressing for our return. I ought to have left a long time ago, but the rain in Qudu keeps falling. I’m in a spot too.”

Ain’t that the truth.

Han Cheng sneered inwardly to himself. The matter was not over yet, so how would the Grand Secretariat dare allow Qi Zhuyin to leave? The lives of those like Kong Qiu and their family all hinged on the Qidong Garrison Troops, and they were hoping that they could remove him from the equation while Qi Zhuyin was still in Qudu.

Han Cheng said to Qi Zhuyin from a distance, “Head out along the Mount Feng military drills grounds. There’s a bridle path to the south leading directly to Hezhou. It’s a newly constructed path that runs along the Kailing River. Discuss it with the Ministry of War later, Commander-in-chief Qi. It's much faster to go from here. The war with the Qingshi Tribe may be over, but there are still the other tribes. The Qidong Five Commanderies' Garrison Troops are all waiting for Commander-in-chief Qi's deployment order. Even I get anxious to hear about it."

Although Han Cheng was a narrow-minded person, he was well-informed. No doubt he had some true worth to be able to sit at the same table with Cen Yu and the others. In addition, he had been to many places for fieldwork, and he was familiar with all the routes, so in this aspect, Qi Zhuyin would not be able to hide it from him.

"I'll wait for an opportunity, I guess." Qi Zhuyin set the wine cup down. "It's all hard to say at this point."

As they conversed, they saw the junior marquis Fei Shi arrive too. Fei Shi and Pan Lin were bosom friends. He had taken ill these days after getting news of Pan Lin's death and no longer went out to have fun. It was not easy to catch sight of him even once.

"Marquis junior went over to join the Eight Great Training Divisions?" Qi Zhuyin asked.

"Pan Chengzhi's death shook him up, and he suddenly bucked up and wanted to seek a job." Han Cheng drank some wine. "There are no vacancies in the imperial court, and only the Eight Great Training Divisions can take him in, so I had him transferred to the Chunquan Battalion."

The Chunquan Battalion was equipped with firearms. Qi Zhuyin thought of those firearms from King Yi of Fanzhou and remembered the Scorpion in Qudu. She heaved a long sigh, finally willing to look Han Cheng in the eyes. "Commander Han."

Han Cheng hurriedly leaned forward, making a show of being all ears.

Qi Zhuyin's expression was grave as she said, "I'm hungry."

Han Cheng promptly burst out laughing. "Commander-in-chief Qi was not in Qudu for the past years and did not know that you had to first fill your stomach before the banquet." He lowered his voice. "It's all cold food at the Hanshi Festival Banquet.<sup>2</sup> There is more of a spread served during the Mid-Autumn Festival, with fine wine and crabs. What a beautiful sight it is to be sitting in the imperial garden admiring the moon and flowers."

Both of them chatted rather merrily until the eunuch outside the hall announced the Empress Dowager's arrival in a resounding, crystal clear voice. Only then did they rise to their feet and retreat behind the small tables, where they kneeled and prostrated themselves to pay their respects in unison with Kong Qiu.

The Empress Dowager was wearing a twelve dragons and phoenixes crown inlaid with gold and precious gems, as well as earrings adorned with eastern pearls. All poised and stately dressed, she showed no hints of the weariness that came with suffering a setback. She merely said “you may rise” after she took her seat in a dignified manner and uttered nothing more. The officials bowed once again, and it was only when they paid their obeisances that the Heir Apparent, Li Jianting, strode into the hall.

Qi Zhuyin’s capacity for wine was average. The few toasts she made to Han Cheng while engaged in small talk with the latter during the feast were all politely declined. Han Cheng did not bring his blade with him, so he was cautious. He kept his eyes constantly on the entrance of the hall, where he had set up his guards.

Kong Qiu led the officials to toast the Empress Dowager and then the Heir Apparent. The atmosphere of the feast was in full swing when Fuman commanded the eunuchs to serve the dishes. The officials from the Hanlin Academy dished out one witty remark after another, the few jokes they told causing the officials at the feast to bowl over with laughter. Even the Empress Dowager’s expression had softened and relaxed some.

Li Jianting rose at the appropriate moment and held up the wine cup to toast the Empress Dowager.

The Empress Dowager looked at her affectionately and said, “My good child does resemble Emperor Guangcheng so. I feel reassured to leave the empire in your hands in the future.”

Li Jianting was already at this age. What “future” was there to speak of?

Li Jianting stood with a bow and drank up all the wine. A faint flush crept into her cheeks, making her look bashful. Playing the role of a filial child to the Empress Dowager’s compassionate mother, she said, “This Imperial Grandchild is dense and has limited knowledge of political affairs. I do not know when I will see the light, so I will still need Imperial Grandmother to supervise and exhort me daily.”

Li Jianting had yet to be involved in government and political affairs. Before the case of the Dancheng’s field taxes, all she was listening to in Mingli Hall were reports the Grand Secretariat submitted as mere formalities. There were indeed many political issues in which her understanding was scant. But Kong Qiu and the others taught her out of selfish motives, analyzing and explaining them to her during lessons, so these words of hers were also merely polite banalities.

The Empress Dowager drank the wine with Li Jianting.

Before the Heir Apparent ascended to the throne, all government administration affairs should be decided by the Grand Secretariat led by Kong Qiu, the minister assisting the ruler in governance. The authority of the Empress Dowager to act in place of the Son of Heaven was originally a symbolic right to annotate, endorse, and make a decision on a memorial. Still, the Empress Dowager, in relying on the noble clans and the Capital Command Troops to influence court administration, had long deviated from the supervisory role Li Jianting spoke of.

Li Jianting bowed and retreated. Once her wine cup was refilled, she toasted Kong Qiu, and teacher and pupil both mutually bowed to each other. She did the same in successive order down the ranks until she finally came before Han Cheng.

Reed pipes music was being played in the hall at this time. The hanging drapes at the entrance were lowered, shrouding the palace door under the shadows. Han Cheng returned the bow. When he finished his wine, he heard Li Jianting say, "Commander Han is the former emperor's right-hand man who also serves as the Viceroy of the Capital Command Troops. I have the highest esteem for your meticulous work and valuable service."

As she spoke, Fuman, who was behind her, refilled the wine cup again. On seeing that, Han Cheng hurriedly said, "Your Highness thinks too highly of this old subject; I'm not deserving of such high praises."

Li Jianting smiled. Traces of exhaustion from her illness was still visible in her face, and this one smile unexpectedly turned out to be rather gentle and mild as she jokingly said, "Teacher is the Grand Secretary of the Grand Secretariat, and Commander Han is a veteran old-timer of the Imperial Bodyguards, so how can I favor one over the other?"

Hearing Li Jianting putting him on par with Kong Qiu and piling on words that seemed to be playing up to him, Han Cheng assumed that the Heir Apparent was frightened by what happened the last time and so wanted to ingratiate herself with both sides to play peacemaker.

Han Cheng held up the wine cup with both hands and faced Li Jianting. "This subject is but a mere soldier. How would I dare to compare myself to the Grand Secretary? Your Highness, here's a toast to you."

Li Jianting looked at Han Cheng as she covered her mouth with her sleeve and drank up the wine in the cup. Fuman refilled it to the brim immediately right after. The wine vessel<sup>3</sup> she had was different from a wine cup, with a deep base and a large capacity. Just two rounds later, Han Cheng had already broken out in a sweat and had no wish to drink any further.

“Your Highness.” Han Cheng’s capacity for wine was passable, but when he got a little tipsy and remembered it was all his men outside this hall, he could not help but let down his guard some as he said to Li Jianting, “Your Highness is still young. With the administration of governmental affairs going by the Grand Secretariat’s rulings, you inevitably neglect to inquire about military affairs. The Grand Secretariat wants to cut the military expenses of the Capital Command Troops this year. That won’t do, Your Highness. Our Capital Command Troops have the important responsibility of both patrols and defenses. We don’t even have a decent military drill ground now, and yet our military expense is still going to be cut. This...”

On hearing this, Kong Qiu, who was standing behind Li Jianting at the side, frowned. He butted in to cut off Han Cheng. “No political talks during the banquets. Why are you grouching about all these to Her Highness?”

Han Cheng drank his wine and grasped the wine vessel in his palm. Smiling hypocritically at Kong Qiu, he said, “Boran, you people drew up the writ wanting me to give in, so I can only voice my difficulties when I meet Her Highness in person. The Chief Surveillance Bureau has been pushing the Marquis of Helian hard these days. He is an honest person, but Cen Xunyi berated him until he has lost all face. Oh, forget it, Your Highness. Just treat it as mere chatter.”

Cen Yu stood up from his own small table and paid his obeisances to both the Empress Dowager and Li Jianting before saying to Han Cheng, “The Chief Surveillance Bureau is in charge of impeachments and is commonly known as the ‘imperial censor’. Every matter it brings forth is a malady of the imperial court. The City of Chuancheng lies close to the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path and links up to the waterways of the City of Dicheng. If there are issues with taxation, then we, as imperial censors, have to bring it up. A joint trial has yet to be set up for the Chuancheng case, and the Grand Secretariat has not really gone into the Marquis of Helian’s crimes in detail. So how can you say I am the one pushing him into a corner? Seems to me like he's the one pushing the common folks of Chuancheng into a corner."

The music in the hall gradually came to a stop. All the court officials present fell silent.

Han Cheng felt humiliated. He could not stand to see officials from humble backgrounds acting all so morally upright. Never mind when it happened in the past before he made it to the top. Now that he held Qudu's life in his hand, Cen Yu still dared to contradict him in public and make his blood boil. Forcing himself to hold back, Han Cheng said with a smile, "Xunyi, you and I are old acquaintances. I understand you. Since Chuancheng has yet to set up a joint trial, that means the document has yet to be endorsed. Every matter presented still needs to be verified. You can't draw conclusions this arbitrarily."

The Marquis of Helian had no troops and power, and even his accounts had been disclosed to the Ministry of Revenue. He was now so restless with anxiety that he was like an ant on a hot pan. Even if he was resentful deep down, he only dared to speak of it in secret. Seeing as they were about to start a dispute now, he lost his appetite. Setting down his chopsticks, he stood up to persuade them tactfully, "Let's not talk about political affairs during the banquet. No political talk..."

Han Cheng handed the empty wine vessel to the eunuch and bowed once more to Li Jianting. "I have marred Your Highness's enjoyment."

Li Jianting also handed her empty wine vessel to Fuman. "Why take it to heart, Commander Han? However—"

However?

Han Cheng looked up in doubt.

A gust of wind blew in from the palace door, and the hanging drape fluttered slowly. Li Jianting raised a hand to hold up the hair at her temple, which seemed to have gotten mussed up. Her fingertips came into contact with the golden hairpin, and she said to Han Cheng with words clear and distinct, "A toast I may share with you; my blade drawn though, yields no mercy."<sup>4</sup>

The hanging drapes fell to the ground, and the doors slammed shut with a thunderous bang. Han Cheng's eyes widened. He instantly retreated, and in his panic, knocked over the small table. The wine vessels and utensils fell and shattered to pieces in a split second. He called out, "Your Highness —!"

Without getting up, Qi Zhuyin slammed a fist onto the small table, jolting up the porcelain plates, bowls, and chopsticks. She grabbed a golden chopstick and thrust it diagonally towards the side of Han Cheng's neck. Han Cheng waved his sleeve to block the blow. A "thud" rang out from the impact of the collision—turned out he was wearing soft armor and arm guards under his official robe!

Han Cheng picked up the small table by a leg and smashed it right towards Li Jianting. He flew into a rage. "Lass of a whorehouse! How dare you kill me?!"

Fuman looked at Han Cheng throw his weight around and heard the resounding clatter of footsteps from outside the hall. Feeling timid, he took a few steps back with the tray in hand. Beside him, Kong Qiu had already lunged over to shield Li Jianting and ended up getting slammed in the forehead by the small table. He pushed Li Jianting back with all his might, paying no heed to the trickling blood. In that startling turn of events, he shouted, "Don't listen to his nonsense! If we don't eradicate this traitor, there will be no peace in the nation! Kill him! Quick!"

A thunderous crash rang out from the door as the guards outside came slamming into the door when they heard the shouts. Fengquan led a few junior eunuchs to press down on the door bolt and hold the door shut. Every single one of the officials in the hall was terrified. The Marquis of Helian, unable to stand steady on his feet, repeatedly retreated and muttered, "What is this..."

Li Jianting lost her balance while retreating and fell to the ground, her heart pounding. Clutching the golden hairpin, she watched Fengquan rock from the slamming at the door and barked sharply, "Block the door! Han Cheng arranged for armored soldiers to surround the palace. His wild ambition is on display for all to see. If we don't kill him tonight, every one of you here and I will die!"

In the panic and confusion, Cen Yu was not paying attention to where he was stepping and tripped over a wine vessel. Xue Xiuzhuo caught hold of him. He waved his arms towards the inside of the hall and said in an urgent tone, "As long as Han Cheng dies, the rebel forces will be without a leader! Commander-in-chief Qi's reinforcements are right behind. Gentlemen, fear not!"

Having said that, he led by example and pounced at the door, working as one with the eunuchs to push against the door.

Han Cheng traded blows with Qi Zhuyin several times, getting the better of her with his well-trained martial arts skills. What's more, he was wearing armor. He pressed Qi Zhuyin hard, causing her to flip over and fall to the ground. The wuzhu accessory in her hair promptly broke and scattered. Not daring to tarry, she swiftly rolled over to leave her original spot. No sooner said than done, Han Cheng stomped on the spot where she had just been lying on earlier.

"Qi Zhuyin!" Han Cheng spat hard. "I've been putting up with you. You really think too highly of yourself. Want to triumph over me? Get your old man here!"

Qi Zhuyin did not bring Zhujiu with her. She usually stormed the enemies on the battlefields, so she was at a disadvantage when encountering those proficient in martial arts like Han Cheng. She led Han Cheng back a few steps and was already at Hua Xiangyi's table. Just as she was about to be forced back towards the Empress Dowager, she suddenly picked up Hua Xiangyi's unfinished cup of wine and tilted her head back to down it all. Then she smashed the porcelain cup, bent her index and middle fingers to pinch a broken porcelain piece between them, and wiped her mouth.

"Don't you know?" Qi Zhuyin told it like it was. "My old man had a stroke."

Han Cheng threw a fist right at Qi Zhuyin. She turned to the side to dodge the blow and raised a hand that did not have a porcelain fragment to grab Han Cheng's arm and twisted it back hard.

Han Cheng did not move a muscle.

Qi Zhuyin, though thwarted, did not let go, but kicked out at Han Cheng in the flank. Han Cheng knew she usually wielded an executioner blade, but he never expected her to have such strength to seize and take down a person when she was just a mere woman. He could not break free at all and took the kick. His murderous nature kicked in, and he let loose a bellow. Thuds rang out repeatedly as he used his elbow to jolt Qi Zhuyin off his hand.

Both of them engaged in a savage fight, stomping the debris under their feet into smithereens as they advanced and retreated.

Meanwhile, the imperial court officials blocking the door were all civil officials who relied solely on their courage to engage in a war of strength with the guards at the other end of the door. That gap in the door grew bigger and bigger. Fengquan could already see the ferocious-looking faces of the guards outside. He suddenly spat a mouthful of saliva at the guards and cursed in a sharp voice, “Despicable bastards wanting to live it up while serving a son of a bitch. Keep fucking dreaming! Push any further, and I’ll flay you!”

He was delicate and refined by appearance. After following the Heir Apparent into the palace, he seemed to have a change of temperament. He did not dare to be reckless and unruly, and no matter who he saw, he was usually all meek and submissive. But he threw all caution to the wind and went all out today, picking up all the tart and scathing words to swear. The officials, too, cursed as well, but they were all men of letters, and even if they had to rack their brains, they had to curse with rhythmic flow, aesthetic sense, and literary grace. And now, hearing Fengquan rattling off a string of expletives like a machine gun, their morales were greatly boosted.

Han Cheng, who was inside, had no wish to engage further. He twisted Qi Zhuyin’s incoming fist to a stop and made to remove Qi Zhuyin’s right arm. Going along with the force, Qi Zhuyin somersaulted and took a blow to the side of her cheek when she landed. The impact from this strike caused her to turn over and crash into a small table at the side. As she propped herself up with her arms, she licked blood that made her tooth ache.

This old dog was truly an expert who wormed his way into Ji Lei’s command, hiding his weaknesses by not making a move and then getting the upper hand when faced up against Qi Zhuyin. How would it have been so easy for him had she been Xiao Chiye with that kind of fearsome arm strength and who was versed in the Ji Clan Boxing Fist?!

Han Cheng pressed in, wanting to kick Qi Zhuyin away by the waist. Qi Zhuyin blocked the blow with both arms and grabbed hold of his leg. She abruptly lifted it up high, turning him over to the ground. Kong Qiu charged out holding a wine jar above his head. Too late to smash it on him, he tossed it aside and latched on to Han Cheng’s arm in a death grip.

For a moment, Han Cheng could not break free with Kong Qiu holding down his left arm. He wanted to turn over and get up, but Xue Xiuzhuo kicked over a small table and knelt at the side, holding down two legs of the table to pin down Han Cheng’s right arm.

With the pressure on both arms, Han Cheng’s expression changed. He hissed aloud, “You despicable lot!”

He jerked himself hard, but Qi Zhuyin leaped to her feet and kicked herself off the ground in a pounce, slicing the broken porcelain shard between her knuckles towards Han Cheng's neck. Han Cheng did all he could to lift his body and took the blow with the armor before his chest. The shard scraped past his neck, drawing out a trail of blood. He was just about to open his mouth when another person lunged at him and wrapped his arms around half of his body.

Gasping heavily for breath, Fuman said, "Commander-in-chief Qi, do it!"

On seeing that it was him, Han Cheng said in a frosty voice with both shock and fury, "A castrated traitor indeed has no righteousness to speak of. I should have killed you a long time back!"

At those words, he really looked as if he was about to stand up, but before he could do so, Qi Zhuyin slammed a fist so hard into him he was knocked back. The force of the blow caused Han Cheng's nose to bleed. He was so full of resentment and hatred that he raised his voice and hollered, "You people are the real traitors by supporting Li Jianting to ascend to the throne! She's merely a whore—"

A squishy plop followed next, and Han Cheng felt an acute stab of pain in his left eye. The pain was so excruciating that he howled with his head tilted back. Amidst the blur of blood, he saw the golden butterfly hanging from the golden hairpin swinging by his cheek.

Han Cheng's voice trembled from the pain. He was already a spent force, like an arrow at the end of its flight. "You... How dare you..."

Li Jianting pulled out the golden hairpin with a shaking hand. Blood splattered over her, sullyng her regal robe. When she saw that Han Cheng was still not dead, she gritted her teeth and closed her eyes to haphazardly stab Han Cheng in the face and neck.

Han Cheng continued, "Whore... You..."

His right eye was injured when Meng pecked it during the downpour in Qudu, and now his left eye was stabbed blind by Li Jianting. He did not look human now, with his facial features a bloody pulp and mouth opening and closing.

"To think... I... meet... my maker..."

Fuman was still pinned down under Han Cheng's back. The latter's blood trickled all over his face, scaring him so much that he shrieked.

With his heart still palpitating, Kong Qiu released his hand and confirmed that Han Cheng was dead. Only then did he heave a sigh of relief and fell onto his butt on the ground.

Han Cheng toppled to the ground, his neck skewed to the side, no longer moving.

Xue Xiuzhuo was gasping for breath too. He stared at Li Jianting with disbelief in his eyes. Li Jianting's bloodstained golden hairpin fell to the ground, making a clear, crisp sound. Both of her hands were washed in blood. Looking as if the sight of Han Cheng frightened her, she took half a step back, holding back the ragged gasps in her throat.

Livestock.

Li Jianting's fingers were shaking badly as she self-mockingly wiped her face under the dead silence. It was as if she was wiping her tears, but all that was left behind were the dark red streaks from her fingers.

I'm not livestock.

Li Jianting met Xue Xiuzhuo's gaze and slowly clenched her fists. Her eyes reddened as she revealed a complicated expression in this sudden change, looking as if she was both crying and laughing.

"I'm not..." Li Jianting squeezed out the words through clenched teeth. She abruptly turned around, facing the doors to the hall, and raised her right hand, as if clenching the power that was once beyond her reach as she enunciated, word for word, "Here stands the Heir Apparent. Who—still wants to be a treacherous traitor?"

The Empress Dowager held on to the handles of her seat for support. Although she was still sitting high up there, she seemed to have returned to the very day she entered the palace. That day, she stood before the towering palace, looking up at Emperor Guangcheng in the prime of his life. Emperor Guangcheng also once stood at the pinnacle of supremacy in the palace with his right hand raised as he said to her, "Here stands the Son of Heaven."

—The Li Clan's Emperor!

Footnotes

1. 清明 Qingming Festival, or Tomb-Sweeping Day, a time for paying respects to the dead.

2. 寒食节 Hanshi Festival, literally Cold Food Festival; the day before the Qingming Festival, when people eat only cold food.
3. Sort of like

4. 金樽同(共)汝饮，白刃不相饶 from 明史•列传 History of Ming; words from Emperor Hongwu, Zhu Yuanzhang, to his minister Ru Taisu; i.e., I may tolerate you and drink with you now, but make a wrong step, and I will kill you without mercy.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 240: ALL OF A SUDDEN

---

The heart-stopping Hanshi Festival drew to a close. Xue Xiuzhuo took away Han Cheng's authority token. Having lost their commander and fearing the majestic, regal presence of legitimate royalty, the guards did not dare to charge forth again rashly and retreated under the impact of Li Jianting's "here stands the Heir Apparent".

The Eight Great Training Divisions' commanding generals awaiting their orders outside the palace were all keeping watch in the Han residence, where wine was flowing freely as they mingled. They had not received any news thus far.

"Viceroy Han isn't back yet. Could he have been retained by that Kong Boran?"

A lad of the Han clan reclining on the couch sucked hard on his pipe and snorted on hearing it. "Kong Boran may not get along with Viceroy Han, but we have troops in our hands—a 20,000-strong Capital Command Troops that can surround the palace at the slightest movement. Who would dare to act recklessly? They are all scholars too weak even to truss a chicken. Are they really going to pin their hopes on Qi Zhuyin? There's no escape for her either."

Hua the Thirteenth listened to the opera singing on the stage and hummed along as he bobbed his head and rhythmically tapped his folding fan on his palm. "Viceroy Han is a great hero. How are those few people who are all show and no substance in the palace his match? What are you worrying needlessly for?"

This Hua the Thirteenth was a descendent of common birth from the Hua clan of Dicheng. He poked his nose into the Imperial Army affairs a while back and was taught a lesson by Xiao Chiye. He feared Xiao Chiye the Tyrant, so he fled back home and passed the days by fooling around and idling his time away in Dicheng. It was only until Xiao Chiye left Qudu that he dared to step foot in the capital.

"Besides," Hua the Thirteenth raised his folding fan upright to point up and smugly said, "who would dare to lay a finger on Viceroy Han with my paternal aunt there?"

The Han clan lad exhaled smoke, traded glances with him, and laughed. They were all bungling oafs who were good-for-nothing, so there was no disdain to speak of between them.

"Fei Shi will be coming in a few days." The Han clan lad motioned the maidservant to stuff the tobacco into his pipe. "The few of us should organize a feast for him to welcome him. He's been feeling depressed over Pan Chengzhi's death."

Hua the Thirteenth put away his folding fan and turned aside to say, "If you ask me, it's just as well Pan Chengzhi died. If he didn't die, what is he going to do exiled to Huaizhou? He'll have to die in our hands sooner or later, and that will ruin our friendship with Fei Shi. It's tricky."

Pan Lin handed over the eight cities' accounts book. This had to be counted.

Not once had it ever crossed their minds that Han Cheng would never return from this trip. Ever since the reign of Yongyi, the Eight Great Training Divisions had been arrogantly lording it over Qudu. It was only during the reign of Xiande that the Imperial Army led by Xiao Chiye had ever threatened their Capital Command Troops' status, but later, the Imperial Army left, and they became the Capital Command Troops of Qudu again. They ran brazenly rampant, no longer playing it cautious.

The few of them drank wine and made merry, the day getting late as they chatted.

Hua the Thirteenth was tipsy. He leaned back against the chair and propped up his legs, then shouted for the opera singer to give him a leg massage. In his drunken state, he pinched her face and teased, "Young lady, how old are you? You look unfamiliar."

The Han clan lad behind hurriedly craned his neck and bragged, “Know who she is? Xi Hongxuan trained her! She’s a famous figure in Qudu. You won’t find her anywhere else once you step out of this door.”

They teased that opera singer, deliberately using obscene words on her. Outside, the watchman’s clapper struck a few times, and the maidservants in the residence went under the eaves to light up the palace lamps.

Qudu was silent. Qi Wei led the garrison troops to kill the deputy general guarding the city and snuck into Qudu. He kept an eye on the time, and when it was past the third quarter in the hour of chou, he raised his hand and signaled for his subordinates to surround the Han residence.

Hua the Thirteenth was feeling sleepy when he suddenly felt the urge to pee. He rose to go to the latrine, and when he passed through the walkway, he saw a faint light in front. He fixed his eyes on it—Fire!

Hua the Thirteenth was so scared that he lost the urge to pee. Lifting his pants, he ran backward and chased after the maidservants to ask, “It’s burning. Why isn’t anyone going to put out the fire? Hurry! Get the Capital Command Troops waiting in the other courtyard to fetch water to put out the fire.”

This residence was Han Cheng’s. If he returned tomorrow morning only to see his house burned down, they would all have to bear the consequences.

While Hua the Thirteenth was looking around, the lad from the Han clan and the others came out on hearing the noise and stood under the eaves to look out into the distance, only to see the fire intensifying.

“What’s going on?” The lad from the Han clan tensed up as well. “Why hasn’t the fire been put out yet?!”

The guard guarding the courtyard came to the door and answered, “This fire is extremely strange, coming in intermittent waves. Someone must have deliberately set it off. Sixth Master, please come to the door to take a look. The Capital Command Troops shall heed your command!”

The lad from the Han clan did not dare to be lazy when it came to this matter, so he dragged the few people beside him and called Hua the Thirteenth to come along. They hurried towards the entrance, but before they could reach the front, they heard someone ahead yell, “They are killing their way in!”

The color drained from Hua the Thirteenth’s face. “Killing their way in? Who?!”

The surrounding servants were thrown into confusion. Someone answered, "Can't get a clear look. It's all pitch-dark. They simply killed every one of the Capital Command Troops on sight upon reaching the entrance. They are pushing their way in."

The lad from the Han clan was so startled he dropped his pipe. He took a few steps forth, dragging his robe along, then shrank back and yelled, "Quick, pass on the deployment order and transfer all the Capital Command Troops at the military drill grounds over as reinforcements!"

But he did not have Han Cheng's authority token, so there was no way he could mobilize the Capital Command Troops at the military drill grounds.

The sound of killing in the front courtyard pressed in towards them. The Capital Command Troops at the entrance, which had tagged along, could not stop them. Seeing that the situation did not bode well, Hua the Thirteenth paid no heed to the others and ran towards the back with the servants crowding together. The lad from the Han clan could not even brandish a blade, and on seeing that, followed suit and took to his heels too.

Qi Wei broke through the door and entered with a fire in hand to look for the men. He disregarded the chaos in the courtyard and slashed away when he came across men from the Capital Command Troops. The Eight Great Training Divisions had long resided in Qudu, and they had never encountered such a tough nut other than the last time they had to wield their blades when they encircled Xiao Chiye. The few commanding generals cowered back and withdrew, and the soldiers under them followed them around in circles as the garrison troops hacked them back into a retreat.

The garrison troops did not let the fire rage for long. The Eight Great Training Divisions were scattered all over the place, and they had no channels in which to pass on messages to one another, so if the fire was too strong, it would no doubt arouse suspicions. By the time the fire in the Han residence was extinguished, a portion of the courtyard interior had already collapsed. Qi Wei did not let Hua the Thirteenth and the others off and rounded up this bunch of good-for-nothing young masters. Only the lad from the Han clan escaped by worming his way out of a dog hole.

The next day, when a glimmer of light materialized on the horizon, the court officials escorted Li Jianting over to Mingli Hall. A series of imperial edicts were then issued, first to depose the Han clan's noble title, then to denounce Han Cheng for his crimes. There was also the move to confiscate the Han clan's properties and execute the entire Han clan on the grounds of "collusion with the intent to rebel against the state". The many descendants of common lineage in the Han clan's hometown of the City of Wucheng were a diverse bunch, and on hearing the news, they all took their valuables and fled helter-skelter.

In just a few short days, the storm in Qudu took a sudden turn. The public on the streets did not even have time to react when a new master stepped onto the throne in that imperial palace. The Empress Dowager took to her bed in illness, and despite her busy schedule, Li Jianting still had to revere and attend to the Empress Dowager as her paternal grandmother, the Grand Empress Dowager. Every day, she would personally sample her medicine and keep watch by her bedside to attend to her.

Cen Yu submitted a memorial to exalt the Heir Apparent's virtuousness and filial piety, and the imperial court and the people promptly broke out in praise. The Empress Dowager was old and frail, and the calls for the Heir Apparent's ascension to the throne gradually grew louder by the day.

"The storm in Qudu has subsided." Yao Wenyu sprinkled baits to the brocade carps in the pond. "Commander-in-chief Qi should have returned to the Bianjun Commandery."

"Ce'an has already returned to the war zone. By the time Commander-in-chief Qi returns, it would be time for him to head over to the Bianjun Commandery too." Shen Zechuan turned aside to face the sunlight and scrutinized the jade pendant in his palm. "Han Cheng died too easily."

This news had only just arrived.

Yao Wenyu's fingers still had residual baits remaining between them. "The Empress Dowager, unable to accept that the noble clans have brought about their own downfall, is too powerless to salvage this hopeless situation. After the Heir Apparent ascends to the throne, she will definitely confer a noble title upon Commander-in-chief Qi to prepare for rainy days."

Carrying the jade pendant in hand, Shen Zechuan smiled.

Yao Wenyu continued, "Your Lordship wants Ge Qingqing to return to Qudu and yet would not permit him to make a move. Presumably, you intend to keep him for a greater purpose."

"No hurry about Ge Qingqing. This move will not be effective until the Heir Apparent ascends to the throne." Shen Zechuan looked at Yao Wenyu.

“I’m looking forward to it.”

The branches of the tender willow by the side of the pond swayed as Hunu pounced out after a butterfly and rolled beside Yao Wenyu’s legs, covered in dust all over. Yao Wenyu lowered his hand to stroke it. “Your Lordship is far-sighted.”

“Xue Yanqing wanted a ‘sovereign’, and Heaven really gave one to him.” Shen Zechuan smiled. “But how would a strong, forceful sovereign subject themselves to the mercy of others?”

“Fear,” Yao Wenyu answered softly.

“That’s right.” Shen Zechuan watched as the brocade carps that had swarmed over scattered in a flurry and floated on the water surface as if satiated. “Xue Yanqing is a powerful minister.”

Xue Xiuzhuo played an indispensable role in supporting the Heir Apparent and auditing the field taxes. He did not covet, snatch, or seize lands by force, but he was a powerful minister. The wise emperors of this world did not fear powerful ministers, but they most certainly feared powerful ministers who had no desires and made no demands.

“If Xue Yanqing is willing to make an effort here, then he ought to give the Heir Apparent a chance to get a handle on him,” Shen Zechuan said. “Even if he has to fabricate it out of nothing, he has to give the Heir Apparent a peace of mind.”

The lack of leverage meant that he was not an easy one to control. In addition, there was no way for checks and balances.

Yao Wenyu pondered over it. “That’s the way Xue Xiuzhuo is. He won’t leave a handle behind for Heir Apparent to control him with.”

Shen Zechuan said meaningfully, “Then he’s in danger.”

The line between the loyal and the treacherous was sometimes blurred, and the decision-making power lay in Li Jianting’s hands. Shen Zechuan figured out what happened during the Hanshi Festival from Ge Qingqing’s report, and the facts proved that the Heir Apparent was not a mere vase that Xue Xiuzhuo shifted over. She was like a thorn that had taken root on the throne and was now rapidly growing there with perseverance that far surpassed others.

“Since Han Cheng is dead, there’s no point in keeping Han Jin.” Shen Zechuan seemed to have just remembered this person. He said to Fei Sheng behind him, “Open Han Jin’s door and let him go. Send him back to Wucheng.”

Fei Sheng thought Shen Zechuan would retain Han Jin. He never expected Shen Zechuan to cast Han Jin away just like this. He found it a pity, but did not dare speak out of turn.

“Dazhou is in shambles. It remains to be seen exactly how many heroes the Son of Heaven can command.” Yao Wenyu turned his wheelchair. “The Heir Apparent will not get into an internal conflict with Xue Xiuzhuo at this time. What’s more pressing now is the Bianjun Commandery. Commander-in-chief Qi is going to storm and seize the Qingshu Tribe’s territory in the fifth month. The Youxiong Tribe will no longer dare to stand by and watch it go down. I fear it will be another intense battle when the time comes.”

“Qidong has ample military provisions. Qi Zhuyin is not afraid,” Shen Zechuan said. “But Zhongbo will not feed men of no worth. Hairigu has been resting for nearly half a year. It’s time to let him out for a walk.”

Yao Wenyu understood his intention. “Is Your Lordship meaning to send Hairigu to negotiate with the Youxiong Tribe?”

“I heard Amu’er is the leader of only six tribes. The Youxiong Tribe has yet to submit and pledge allegiance to him.” Shen Zechuan was still looking at the water surface. “The Qingshu Tribe’s lands all belong to Amu’er, and their provisions had all been given to Hasen in the northern battlefields. It’s also for the sake of food that the Youxiong Tribe is being forced to go into battle, and we do not lack food.”

Amu’er split up Dazhou with the Scorpions, and now that Shen Zechuan had a batch of Scorpions in his hands, it was a waste to keep them in his hands. He wanted to make Hairigu put himself to use.

“The Qingshu Tribe, Youxiong Tribe, Gedale, and the Huiyan Tribe in the north.” Shen Zechuan looked back. “Bridging these places together is the New Year’s gift I want to send Amu’er.”

What Amu’er stole from Zhongbo, Shen Zechuan could not get back, but he could use a different way to make Amu’er pay. The line from the territory of the Qingshu Tribe to the territory of the Huiyan Tribe just so happened to obstruct the riverbanks of the Chashi River.

“Duanzhou doesn’t have a wall of defense thick enough.” The tassel on Shen Zechuan’s fingertips swayed slightly. “And coincidentally, so does the Youxiong Tribe.”

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 241 : A FINE WOMAN

Now that the rain in Qudu had come to a stop, it was time for Qi Zhuyin to make her journey back home. She received Hua Xiangyi at the entrance of the palace. The carriage was right by the side, but she secured Zhujiu on her and said to Hua Xiangyi, “Let’s go for a walk.”

Hua Xiangyi noted that Qi Zhuyin’s broken wuzhu hairpin still had a golden thread dangling in her hair, as though this was how it should have been. The commander-in-chief did not cut a sorry figure at all—that was, if one could overlook her bruised face.

Qi Wei raised a hand to gesture for the carriage to follow behind him. It was only after Qi Zhuyin and Hua Xiangyi had walked some distance ahead that he followed along.

A warm breeze was presently drifting through the marketplace, where the crowd bustled amidst air reeking with a blend of sweat and deep-fried food. Spring flowers in full bloom a distance away seemed to be coated in a layer of grease, making Qi Zhuyin feel stifled.

As they passed by the sugar figurine<sup>1</sup> stall, Qi Zhuyin asked Hua Xiangyi, “Want one?”

Next to this stall was a path where people and carriage came and went, sending clouds of dust flying all over. Hua Xiangyi was the apple of the Hua clan’s eyes. Before her arrival in Qudu, she rarely went outdoors, instead staying in her courtyard to live a sheltered, pampered life. She looked at Qi Zhuyin, who fished out her remaining copper coins from her sleeve pocket and flicked them lightly before her. In the ensuing buzz, Qi Zhuyin said with satisfaction, "I have money."

This street was not bright enough, but as Qi Zhuyin pulled the corners of her bruised lips to flash a smile, the lanterns behind her instantaneously lit up in successive order. She was like a young maiden of eighteen or nineteen of age who had run away from home to play, with nothing on her mind except this candy.

Clutching her handkerchief, Hua Xiangyi lifted a finger and pointed to one of them. "I'd like this one."

She felt bashful over her words, and that subtle emotion lay concealed between her eyebrows. This was something she had never done before, and it was also something she would never have done before.

Qi Zhuyin tossed the copper coins to the vendor and gave the sugar figurine to Hua Xiangyi. She did not care if she had no money. She never had money before, anyway. Money never remained for long in her hands.

Hua Xiangyi carefully held the sugar figurine with her fingertips and kept her composure as she scrutinized it by the light. She had once caught a glimpse of a sugar figurine past her attendants in the brief flicker of a moment through the gap of her sedan's screen when it fluttered. There were candies in the palace, and the Empress Dowager used to ask Matron Liuxiang to keep them on hand for her from time to time.

Qi Zhuyin rubbed the bruise on her face with the pulp of her finger and turned sideways to survey her reflection in the water crock through several overlapping shadows.

Qi Zhuyin was a descendant of a noble, but Hua Xiangyi always felt that she did not look the part. She was so sanguine and broad-minded that she resembled a wandering traveler. Hua Xiangyi had been in Qidong for half a year, and she had never seen Qi Zhuyin fly into a rage. It was as if there was nothing worth Qi Zhuyin getting angry over.

"Does Commander-in-chief Qi come here often?" Hua Xiangyi asked.

"All the ones who dare to play loan sharks in Qudu are here. Whenever I come here, chances are that it's to borrow money." As Qi Zhuyin spoke, she removed the hairpin in her hair and said a little regretfully, "That wuzhu hairpin was bestowed upon me by the imperial court. All this while, I never dared to sell it. Had I known that it would end up getting broken in the palace, I would've sold it."

Hua Xiangyi said, "The manors at home..."

Qi Zhuyin did not wait for Hua Xiangyi to finish her words. "Just what I wanted to tell you today. The family manors and shops will all be handed over to you to take care of in the future. You'll decide whether to rent them out or sell them away."

She turned around in all seriousness to face Hua Xiangyi.

"Let's speak our mind here."

Qi Zhuyin did not move the conversation to the teahouse. She loved the downtown streets and the marketplace. By standing here, she was making her stance known; she was not afraid to face up to anyone's scrutiny.

"I have to thank you for the matter regarding the eight cities' granaries." Qi Zhuyin bowed slightly to her, her long hair spreading behind her. She straightened up again. "Or it'd have been perilous this time."

Hua Xiangyi turned to the side, not accepting the bow. "The credit goes to Chengzhi."

Qi Zhuyin looked at her. "Pan Lin was not the one who told me, so I'll only thank you."

At Qi Zhuyin's gaze, Hua Xiangyi gripped at the sugar figurine until it nearly melted.

"But I shall be blunt too. Did you tell me about the eight cities' granaries because you wanted me to do something for you?" Qi Zhuyin was straight and direct to the point, totally forgetting all about tact.

This Third Missy Hua was a rather strange one too.

Qi Zhuyin spent sleepless nights tossing and turning, but could not figure out why Hua Xiangyi would reveal the matter about the granaries to her. Had it not been for her reminder in the palace, the outcome of this game would still be an unknown.

Hua Xiangyi bent her fair neck to look at the sugar figurine amid the babel of voices. "Commander-in-chief Qi needs not do anything for me. Just... fight against the Biansha."

Qi Zhuyin gazed fixedly at Hua Xiangyi. All of a sudden, she propped herself on her knees and tilted her head to look at Hua Xiangyi's expression.

"Is that all?" She asked in puzzlement.

Qi Zhuyin gave Hua Xiangyi a fright. This posture was just like the last time Qi Zhuyin lifted her veil, when she had simply charged before her without giving Hua Xiangyi the chance to compose herself.

“You helped Yao Wenyu escape in Qudu...” Qi Zhuyin looked as if she had just woken up from her sleep. She found Hua Xiangyi pleasant-smelling, with a hint of flower fragrance like she expected. But when her wandering mind snapped back to reality, she realized Hua Xiangyi was still holding the sugar figurine, waiting with composure and rapt attention for her to continue.

“...and told me about the granaries.” Qi Zhuyin covered up the fact that her mind was wandering earlier. “Was that because you married my father?”

Hua Xiangyi answered, “Chengzhi was the one who saved Yuanzhuo.”

Qi Zhuyin shook her head and said with certainty. “It was you.”

Hua Xiangyi pushed the credits to the others on these occasions, as if she could not admit to it. The boundary line that hindered her was the Empress Dowager’s love and affection. The last of the sunset glow of the street was swallowed up, and the lanterns shone so bright they looked like falling stars. Meanwhile, the smell of deep-frying dissipated a little, although the marketplace was still hot and stuffy. Hua Xiangyi looked out of place here.

“Back during the reign of Xiande, my paternal aunt would set questions for me from time to time, most frequently during the spring plowing season every year.” Hua Xiangyi lowered the sugar figurine as if twiddling with the shadows of the past. “In truth, they were all accounts of the eight cities. The more I calculated, the clearer I became. I once advised my aunt during the reign of Xiande to let Jiang Qingshan go over, but they thought it was enough for Jiang Qingshan to oversee the thirteen cities. That year, people dying of starvation became a common sight in Zhongbo. In the years that followed, the six prefectures took a further beating from the grains transferred from the eight cities. Too many people died.” She lifted her head gently. “So much more than when the Biansha massacred the cities.”

Hua Xiangyi lived deep in the palace. She donned exquisite silks, feasted on delicacies, slumbered on satin, while those on the other end of the vermilion walls dressed in rags, sold their children for food, and slept in the bitter cold. She stood with the Empress Dowager on the western tower and looked out into the distance. The illusion of prosperity and glory blinded her eyes, but very quickly, she realized that these people never had the thought to stop. Hai Liangyi killed himself in Mingli Hall, and yet the Empress Dowager never thought to change.

“I want my aunt to stop,” Hua Xiangyi said.

The people were the rivers bearing the weight of boats—this was the foundation. Yet the Empress Dowager still wanted to count on the Eight Great Training Divisions to suppress the rumors—that was defying the laws of nature.

The rise and fall of the empire did not lay on the sovereign at all. The world needed only an emperor with the heart that knew to show compassion for all the hardships in this world.

“I’m confined to my chamber, and my abilities are limited. Compared to Yuanzhuo or Chengzhi, what I can do is insignificant in the grand scheme of things.” Hua Xiangyi slowly returned a bow to Qi Zhuyin when she spoke to this point. “Commander-in-chief Qi traverses Qidong and gallops the battlefield. If you can repel the Twelve Tribes of Biansha, that’d be a great service to humankind. And for that reason, I want Commander-in-chief Qi to walk out of Qudu alive.”

Qi Zhuyin received this bow, looking as if she had just recognized who Hua Xiangyi was.

“You are a fine woman.” Qi Zhuyin paused for a moment. “And I shall repay you with military accomplishments on the battlefield.”

Footnotes

- 1.
2. 糖人; sugar figure is a traditional Chinese form of folk art using hot, liquid sugar, or sugar syrup, to create three-dimensional figures that come in a variety of shapes from animals to objects. A dragon sugar figure is shown in the picture above.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 242 : YOUXIONG (TRIBE)

The fifth month was the height of summer, and it was so scorching hot that the advisors could not stand the heat. All of them hid under the pavilion in the center of the pond, sipping their tea, smoking their pipes, and fanning themselves vigorously with their folding fans. Yu Xiaozai, after drinking his fill of cooled tea, was now feeling rather uncomfortable. Just as he was thinking of making his way over to the latrine, he saw Fei Sheng leading Hairigu over to the courtyard.

“Second Master is going to cross the border within these two days.” Yu Xiaozai wiped the sweat from his neck with his handkerchief. “Is Hairigu tagging along too?”

“He’s a Scorpion.” Kong Ling, keeping himself in good health, did not consume cold food; instead, he sat by the cascading water to cool off in the shade. “He can negotiate with the Youxiong Tribe.”

This was at the Prefectural Lord’s behest, so Yu Xiaozai could not refute. He nodded and sat next to Yao Wenyu. “I heard the Youxiong Tribe people are all strong and sturdy, and they ride horses that are big and tall, unlike the other tribes in the desert.”

Gao Zhongxiong had never seen the Youxiong Tribe before either. He stayed his brush, and as he dipped it in ink, he turned his head and waited with Yu Xiaozai for Yao Wenyu’s answer.

Yao Wenyu closed the book on his lap. "The Youxiong Tribe is a large tribe in the southwest of the desert. Before Amu'er rose to power, the strongest tribe in the desert was the Hanshe Tribe, followed by the Youxiong Tribe. The Youxiong Tribe used to be stationed in the east of Suotian Pass. They have their own horses, so they don't use the ponies from the Gouma Tribe. The horses of the Youxiong Tribe are also called the 'bear horses'.<sup>1</sup> They are even bigger than the war steeds from Libei."

Gao Zhongxiong initially thought that it was rumors Yu Xiaozai was talking about; he never expected it to be true. Alarmed to hear it, he said, "I heard rumors of the Youxiong Tribe while I was in imperial college. Back then, the Feng clan was the one to guard over Suotian Pass. 'Silver Spear of the Snowy Pass', Feng Yisheng! General Feng was the one who fought the Youxiong Tribe back to the east."

The four generals of Yongyi were renowned: Silver Spear of Snowy Pass, Feng Yisheng; Iron Wings of Hongyan, Xiao Fangxu; Thunderbolt of Cangjun, Qi Shiyu; and, Flying Frost of Bianjun, Lu Pingyan. They were all men the lads of Dazhou spoke about the most in their early years. Feng Yisheng, like Xiao Fangxu, came from a humble background. When he was fourteen years old, he pointed to the continuous range of snowy peaks of Suotian Pass and made a vow to become Dazhou's impregnable bastion of iron. At forty years of age, he buried his youngest, last remaining son under the snowy peaks. Eventually, he met his end in battle, leaving only his thumb ring carved out of bone to his adopted son, Zuo Qianqiu.

"Yuanzhuo is indeed widely read and knowledgeable. To think you even know about the Youxiong Tribe. In fact, Qidong's earliest battle steeds were bred with the 'bear horses'." Kong Ling said. "When the King of Wolves, Xiao Fangxu, was a junior soldier at Luoxia Pass, all the horses from Luoxia Pass were transferred from Qidong, and they were also of this breed of horse."

"Whoa," Yu Xiaozai exclaimed. "That fierce, huh!"

"When Amu'er unified the four tribes of Hanshe, Gouma, Liaoying, and Qingshu, he had the thought of making the Youxiong Tribe pledge allegiance to him." Feeling cold, Kong Ling got up to return to the table. "They fought, and Amu'er ended up with nothing to show for it."

This time, the interest of the remaining three men was piqued, and they sat around Kong Ling.

Gao Zhongxiong said, "That was the four tribes, elites that would even put the Libei Armored Cavalry at a disadvantage."

"These were different places. The Youxiang Tribe was still roaming near Suotian Pass at that time. They occupied the higher grounds, and it proved to be tedious for the Hanshe Tribe to storm and assault them. Charge before the Youxiang Tribe, and they would take a beating." Kong Ling laughed and enacted it out vividly. "There were always the Youxiang appearing and disappearing among the endlessly meandering snowy peaks. Wielding scimitars in hand and sporting leather armors on their arms, they launched an attack from top to bottom and gave the Hanshe Tribe a kick in the chest. The Hanshe Tribe then tumbled down to the ground and passed out—"

Yu Xiaozai promptly yelled, "Oh, dear me. How terrible!"

Yao Wenyu almost choked and spat out the tea he had not swallowed. Covering his nose and mouth with the handkerchief in his palm, he coughed a few times before regaining his composure.

Kong Ling said with a smile, "Indeed. They fought until Amu'er was at the end of his rope and had no choice but to transfer the Qingshu Tribe near the Bianjun Commandery."

Wiping himself, Yao Wenyu said, "The Youxiang Tribe has its hero too. When General Feng was still alive, the man who faced up against him in battle was called Suhebashou. He was the 'Hero' of the Youxiang Tribe."

Gao Zhongxiong moved forward. "This Su... I know him! Yuanzhuo, I don't know if you still remember, but when I just stepped into the capital, it was the legend of General Feng that I never got tired of listening to in the teahouse near the imperial college. He and this Suhebashou were just like... the King of Wolf and Amu'er!"

"He was a hero," Kong Ling said. "If not for Amu'er, the Hanshe Tribe's current standing would have been occupied by the Youxiang Tribe, led by Suhebashou. He was both Feng Yisheng's foe and friend. There was this one tale from the teahouses in Dengzhou. I don't know if it's fabricated, but it is said that when Feng Yisheng shot through the Hongying banner<sup>2</sup> that symbolized the dignity of Biansha, Suhebashou applauded in response. Both men looked at each other across thousands upon thousands of soldiers and horses and roared with laughter. From then on, they would always mutually send their regards to each other before a battle."

Gao Zhongxiong gripped his brush between his fingers and struck a pose to imitate that storyteller. “General Feng, sans his armor, stood amid the snow with his hands at his back and his white robe flapping in the wind, cutting the very picture of a poised, suave man. Suhebashou, cloaked with a fur hide, cupped his fists at the General across the curtain of snow and, in a loud, clear voice, said—”

“Are the grain wagons for the Armored Cavalry ready?”

Gao Zhongxiong paused in mid-pose. Before he could close his agape mouth, he saw Kong Ling and the others all stand up to bow in unison to Shen Zechuan behind him.

“They are ready,” Kong Ling said. “Fei Sheng has already checked them this morning. Qiao Tianya will send them out of the city later.”

Shen Zechuan tapped the back of Gao Zhongxiong’s shoulder with his folding fan and said, “I am Suhebashou, Valiant Tiger<sup>3</sup> of the Youxiong Tribe. I’ve brought along kumis<sup>4</sup> from my hometown. The wine is delicious, and I wish to wait for the General to finish it before we fight.”

Gao Zhongxiong put down his brush in a fluster and turned around to bow to the Prefectural Lord.

“No need to be nervous,” Shen Zechuan said. “As they say, ‘of dreams the lads of Dazhou bear of the snowy pass, who knows not of the Suotian spear?’ Shifu used to love to listen to this tale too.”

Hairigu stood at the entrance of the pavilion and said, “Suhebashou, the Valiant Tiger of the Youxiong Tribe. I know of him too.”

Fascinated with the story, Yu Xiaozai probed, “What happened to both of them after?”

Kong Ling did not answer. Hairigu picked up a fruit on the table and took a bite before saying, “Suhebashou killed Feng Yisheng’s youngest son, and he also killed Feng Yisheng. He was then driven out of Suotian Pass by Amu’er and spent some time in Gedale before retreating behind the Qingshu Tribe.”

This was a strange man.

Hairigu remembered Suhebashou, the legendary Valiant Tiger and hero. He abandoned himself to pleasure and merrymaking in Gedale. Every time he was drunk, he always wanted to pound on the drum and dance in honor of the dead. This tall, strapping man had white in his hair. He was not old, and yet he looked as though he had already died.

“I had a friend.” Suhebashou drank his wine under the firelight. “He drank my kumis, and killed my sons. I took my revenge on him, and he left me.”

He turned the wine sachet upside-down—empty.

“We are the brave eagles<sup>5</sup> on both sides of the snowy peaks. If we have to die, it has to be at each other’s hands.”

“A pity he died.” Hairigu finished his fruit. “He caught a cold in Gedale and was too ill even to get up. The Hanshe Tribe surrounded him. He finished all the kumis in the tent by himself. Eventually, he took his scimitar with him and died in battle on the Gobi desert. Gegenhasi<sup>6</sup> of the Hulu Tribe cut off his head and offered it up to Amu’er.”

Yu Xiaozai uttered an “oh” and said no more.

The crowd in the pavilion at the heart of the pond all fell silent.

Using Suhebashou’s head, Gegenhasi helped turn the Hulu Tribe into a friend of Amu’er. At the same time, he also became Hasen’s friend. Several years later, the hooves of Xiao Fangxu’s horse stomped on Gegenhasi’s neck, breaking it. And several more years later... Kong Ling did not voice it out.

“With Hairigu going to the Bianjun Commandery, does Your Lordship still want Huo Lingyun to tag along?” Yao Wenyu skipped over the topic and asked.

“Huo Lingyun is not going to the Bianjun Commandery.” Shen Zechuan turned his head to look out of the cascading water, where Huo Lingyun stood with his back straightened. He continued, “His firearms are heading north.”

The next day, Xiao Chiye led the Armored Cavalry across the border. Shen Zechuan stood on the bridle path before the city gate and watched the yellow sand roll in. Meng circled down and called out twice above Shen Zechuan’s head; it then soared once more and charged southward.

Hearing the thunderous sound of the Libei Armored Cavalry, Fei Sheng stepped forward and moved to block out the sand for Shen Zechuan. Shen Zechuan held up his folding fan a little and stopped Fei Sheng from standing before him.

Lang Tao Xue Jin, in its heavy armor, snorted hot puffs of air and drove straight over from the other end of the bridle path where it was leading the Armored Cavalry. A smile gradually spread on Shen Zechuan’s face, and he raised his right arm as Xiao Chiye drew closer. His wide sleeve slid down to reveal the arm guard within.

With eyes in front and without reining in his horse, Xiao Chiye lowered an arm as he passed by Shen Zechuan. A loud, clear “thud” rang out as both arm guards bumped together and scraped past in just a blink of an eye.

The wind fanned up Shen Zechuan’s sleeves and robe. He said, “To a resounding victory.”

Xiao Chiye laughed as he continued to spur his horse on towards the blazing sun. In a loud voice, he responded, “A resounding victory!”

Waves of heat swept across while the windblown sand pounced over the path.

Both men brushed past each other, neither looking back.

Footnotes

1. Youxiong is a tribe that takes the bear as its totem. The Biansha Tribes’ names are based on animals. For a list, you can refer to to the Worldmap guide!
2. Literally rainbow hawk/eagle/falcon
3. Literally ferocious tiger, aka brave warrior
4. 马奶酒 kumis, also written as kumiss or koumiss, is an alcoholic beverage traditionally made from fermented mare’s or camel’s milk.
5. Literally brave eagle, aka heroic fighter.
6. For those who can’t remember him, check out the new searchable character list!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 243 : STRIVE

The Bianjun Commandery, in facing the desert, was subjected to encroachment by the windstorm. Rarely could one see the blue dome of heaven standing atop the city walls. The dwellings in the territory were all low, and all that could be seen if one were to look into the distance at the open ground was a vast expanse of earthy yellow. Greenery along the way was few and far between, and only a few crooked, sickly trees could be seen after a few li on the horse. Wild grass and weeds spread unevenly among the Gobi, much like an old master over the age of fifty about to go bald.

Xiao Chiye's helmet was covered in a layer of dust. He took off his helmet and, with his back to the setting sun, looked ahead at the Bianjun Commandery's city walls drifting among the waves of sand.

"This place really is poor." Hairigu leaped off his horse, and the accessories around his neck clanked. He unscrewed his water canteen and tilted his head back to pour water over his face. With eyes closed, he said, "The Scorpions won't come here at all."

The Bianjun Commandery had no fields, and the lands underfoot were too barren and infertile. They were already exposing signs of cracking apart under the scorching hot sixth month. Xiao Chiye shifted his military boot away and watched the insect crawling between the crevices in the loess.

"The grasslands east of Suotian Pass that Amu'er went to great effort to obtain were hit by an onslaught of yellow sands and subsequently turned into a wasteland during the first year of the Xiande reign. Consequently, the Qingshu Tribe abandoned it and retreated back to the eastern side of the Bianjun Commandery." Hairigu brushed back his wet hair. "His Lordship wants me to discuss with the Youxiong Tribe, but doesn't give me bait. This business requires brains. And of that, I have none."

Hairigu was not honest. He knew how he should negotiate, just like he negotiated with Yan Heru. This Black Scorpion knew the rules. Shen Zechuan did not give him a definite bait, which implied that no matter how good a deal he managed to negotiate, Shen Zechuan had the final say over his rewards. However, Hairigu wanted to glean an opportunity to bargain from Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye did not look at Hairigu as he answered, "You better have one."

Hairigu rubbed the back of his neck, looking a little embarrassed. The water he poured over himself soon vanished. His skin, that lay exposed under the sweltering heat, was a shade of bronze. Hairigu sealed back the water canteen and redoubled his effort. "I'll give the Youxiong Tribe food to tide over the winter. With ample food, they'd be able to remain in their territory."

"If that's all you can do," Xiao Chiye's eyes followed the movements of the shadows and settled upon the city gate of the Bianjun Commandery, "then anyone can negotiate this deal."

Having hit a brick wall continuously, Hairigu rubbed his congested nose and said, "Alright then. I'll give them new options."

The gate of the Bianjun Commandery was in the midst of opening. Qi Zhuyin stood before the hoisted gate with her arms folded and her blade hanging on her waist. She had gone on a night expedition last night to conduct reconnaissance, and she had only just returned at the end of the day today. She looked fatigued, having slept for only four hours, and she did not seem that happy to see Xiao Chiye.

"Yo," Qi Zhuyin said. "You're here."

Xiao Chiye tossed his authority token to Qi Zhuyin, who caught it and offhandedly handed it over to Qi Wei without even looking at it. Then she turned around and led Xiao Chiye into the city.

"When I arrived here in the fourth year of Xiande, Lu Guangbai said he wanted to plant trees." Xiao Chiye's heavy armor was scalding hot under the last rays of the setting sun. "So why is the Bianjun Commandery still so barren?"

"That was wishful thinking on his part." Qi Zhuyin's neck was sore from her sleep, so she exercised her head a little. Watching the lanterns on the streets gradually lighting up, she said, “The sandstorm was strong during the sixth year of Xiande. He saved up some money to buy a batch of seedlings from Hezhou and planted them at the border while it was still spring. But they barely made it to the end of the month before the cavalry trampled over them.”

“Was Hasen the one stationed in the Qingshu Tribe at that time?” Xiao Chiye mounted the steps and placed his helmet to the side. He then sat with Qi Zhuyin and watched the armored cavalry enter the city.

“It was.” Qi Zhuyin did not sit, instead leaning against the door with her chin dipped in the evening glow. “The letter you had Zhao Hui deliver has long arrived. There will be a tough battle to fight in the sixth month, but only on the premise that Hasen will really turn around and head south to attack Duanzhou. If he doesn’t come, the Sha’er Camp will have to bear the consequences of your deployment of troops this time.”

“Amu’er has united with the Hulu Tribe and is still persuading the Youxiong Tribe to pledge allegiance to him. Meanwhile, Hasen has not much food left,” Xiao Chiye said. “He has to go to Duanzhou to obtain provisions.”

“You brought along a Scorpion,” Qi Zhuyin said. “What is Shen Zechuan planning to do?”

“When Hasen attacks Duanzhou, his reinforcements have to stop at Gedale on the opposite bank of the Chashi River. Only the Youxiong Tribe can intercept me in the southeast.” Xiao Chiye stretched out his legs.

“Lanzhou wants to negotiate with the Youxiong Tribe.”

“Then he has to present them with enough sincerity.” Qi Zhuyin stood up straight and raised an arm to point at the snowy peaks far away in the south. “The bears<sup>1</sup> have owned pastures in the south. Shen Zechuan’s granaries can’t fill their stomachs. They’re greedy in ways you can’t even imagine.”

Qi Zhuyin—no, starting with Qi Shiyu, Qidong had attempted to negotiate with the Youxiong Tribe in the hope that they would defect to Dazhou like the Huiyan Tribe in the north, but it proved to be too difficult. The Youxiong Tribe was a strong tribe; they were completely different from the Huiyan Tribe with nothing to their name. They believed that their scimitars and ‘bear-horses’ could grab them even better lands, and for that reason, they did not even give a hoot about Amu’er.

“Lanzhou is willing to cede the Hanshe Tribe’s territory to them,” Xiao Chiye said. “They have been roaming all over after leaving Suotian Pass. This is what they want most.”

Qi Zhuyin squatted down and said to Xiao Chiye, “Right, you guys are really too clever. The Youxiong Tribe does indeed want territory, but are you the great ruler of the desert? The tricks Shen Zechuan used on the Dazhou folks in Zhongbo are useless here. The bears don’t munch on the pies in the sky—empty promises won’t work on them. I have dealt with them before; they are far more cunning than the Hanshe Tribe.”

Li Xiong was catching lizards beneath the eaves. He kneeled on the polished wooden planks, carrying a lizard by its tail as he said to Ding Tao, “Grill it. It’s tasty.”

Ding Tao was sitting cross-legged, with a brush in hand, writing and drawing. When he caught some time to take a breather, he cast a glance at the lizard and said in disdain, “Ew.”

Li Xiong lightly swung the lizard around. “This is a snake of Gedale.”

Ding Tao had not heard Li Xiong bring up Gedale and Lei Jingzhe in a long time. He set his notebook aside and looked at the lizard. “Doesn’t this look just like the lizards of Cizhou?”

Li Xiong sniffed the air, then answered. “It’s not the same. This one has a smell, the smell of the desert, of yellow sand!”

“It even went as far as fleeing from Gedale.” Ding Tao held his chin in a pensive pose. “Life in Gedale must have been tough. Staying here is still the most comfortable.”

Li Xiong answered, “No, it likes to stay...”

Fei Sheng yelled for Ding Tao from where he stood at the other end. Ding Tao scrambled to his feet in one move and ran over without waiting for Li Xiong to finish his sentence. The sweets that he had bundled in his lap fell all over the ground.

“... in the same old place.” Looking at Ding Tao, Li Xiong reached out to pick up all the sweets and stuff them all into his mouth in one go, his words muffled as he said, “I like staying in the same old place, too.”

The current chieftain of the Youxiong Tribe was someone called Dalantai. He was not a relative of Suhebashou, but his bodyguard. After Suhebashou died in battle in Gedale, Dalantai fled to the area behind the Qingshu Tribe with the remainder of the Youxiong Tribe's elite troops and remained there for many years.

Dalantai sat before the tent and pulled a potato out from the campfire. He broke it apart and ate it with the sun-dried horse meat. His beard was so thick he appeared rather comedic while chewing. He was not as imposing and majestic as Suhebashou had been. On the contrary, he was very short and small, so much that he did not look like a man that hailed from the Youxiong tribe.

"Wise one who traverses the desert, you have ridden your horse before my tent and brought along the exhortation of the Heroic Eagle." Dalantai swallowed the scalding hot potatoes and watched Bayin beside the campfire. "But the demands of the Heroic Eagle are too extortionate."

"Chieftain of the bears beneath the snowy peaks," Bayin sat cross-legged and bowed to Dalantai. "I bring with me the most sincere greetings from the Heroic Eagle. The demands are all negotiable, for the Heroic Eagle sees you as a friend."

Hasen was the Heroic Eagle of the Hanshe tribe. He had sent over the wise Bayin long before Xiao Chiye had set out.

Dalantai gave the other half of the potato to Bayin. "The wolf pup of Libei is young and strong. I heard that he killed Huhelu and Achi, and defeated the proud Scorpions of the Heroic Eagle at the Chashi Sinkhole. I'm already too old to ride a horse anymore. I'm afraid I can no longer fight with such a young man."

Bayin accepted the potato with both hands and hesitated for only a brief moment before replying. "You are the 'bear' of the 'Valiant Tiger', Suhebashou, and you lead the Youxiong Tribe to stand tall in the southeast of the desert. You are a strong man that even the Hanshe Tribe dare not provoke rashly. The Heroic Eagle has strong faith in your might. The wolf pup of Libei is way too young. He is far less terrifying than the King of Wolves."

"If that is truly the case," Dalantai wiped his beard, "then why hasn't the Heroic Eagle, who had hacked off the head of the King of Wolves, slaughtered this wolf yet?"

Dalantai was not lying; he was indeed very old. His hair was not yet white, but both his hands had already lost the ability to hold on to a blade for long. Even though he did not possess the spirit Suhebashou had, he could lead the Youxiong Tribe into weathering blizzards and maintain their dignity as a powerful tribe of the desert. He was not of the same ilk as Huhelu; he resembled a wise sage more than Bayin did.

“This is the reason the Heroic Eagle sent me to look for you,” Bayin said. “Our mighty cavalry has yet to break through the defenses of the Libei Armored Cavalry not because we are not powerful enough, but because we are out of provisions. The King of Wolves is dead. Honorable and wise Dalantai, you have also seen the future of the desert. We are about to stride into new, uncharted territory where all the tribes will no longer have to starve. This is the wish of the Great Hero, as well as the wish of the Heroic Eagle. We need your help.”

The aroma of the potatoes buried in the campfire wafted out. Dalantai prodded them with a tree branch, not at all moved by Bayin’s deference. “Many years ago, Gegenhasi<sup>2</sup> of the Hulu Tribe resorted to underhand means to kill my chief in Gedale and offered the head of the ‘Valiant Tiger’ to Amu’er. Amu’er did not reject it.” He picked up a potato again, but did not break it open. Instead, he wiped away the dirt on it with the rough pulps of his fingers. “Amu’er is a rapacious vulture. He is not our brother.”

A warrior of the Youxiong Tribe sitting at the other end stood up, a gesture meant to see a guest out.

Bayin did not move. He faced Dalantai and said, “Honorable Dalantai, that was a foolish mistake of ours in the past. We now have a common enemy...”

“Who was the one to force this enemy awake?” Dalantai’s eyes, which resembled a line, looked towards Bayin. “Amu’er intends to conquer every corner where the sun shines upon, and for that reason, he did not hesitate to use such shameless means to coerce us into leaving from our homeland. You stupid, low-down lad. To think you would call Suhebashou’s murder a foolish mistake.”

Bayin said, “I apologize for my words, Dalantai...”

The “bears” blocked the surrounding light off. They stood all around, watching Bayin with a gaze akin to watching an antelope.

“If Hasen wants our help, he should beg for our forgiveness.” Dalantai peeled off the potato skin. “If Hasen is willing to kill his wife and let the bastards of the Hulu Tribe pay the price, we will agree to send our troops to the Bianjun Commandery on his behalf.”

“Don’t do this.” Bayin had already been dragged up. He raised his voice. “Gegenhasi is already dead. Duo’erlan is an innocent maiden.”

Dalantai looked at Bayin as he devoured the potato all by himself.

Footnotes

1. Youxiong is a tribe that takes the bear as its totem. The Biansha Tribes' names are based on animals. For a list, you can refer to to the Worldmap guide!
2. For those who can't remember him, check out the new searchable character list!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 244 : SNOWY PEAKS

Chagan knelt reverently in the tent, his ash-white hair cascading down to the ground as he pleaded, “Honorable Hero, the Youxiong Tribe is the most crafty bear in the great desert. We of the Hulu Tribe are willing to double the supply of grains your esteemed self needs.”

The Great Hero, Amu’er, stared at the letter in his palms. Hasen bore some resemblance to him, but he was far more rugged and stronger than Hasen. Amu’er set down the letter and gently brushed his thumb with the thumb ring across his slovenly stubble. He looked like a man who could topple over drunk any side by the side of the road.

“There’s a saying in Dazhou, ‘act within one’s capabilities.’” Amu’er’s voice was low and deep. “I thank you for your utmost sincerity, but my friend, your sheep flocks have all been sent to the war zone. If this goes on, many people from the Hulu Tribe will starve to death in winter this year.”

Chagan’s kneeling and kowtowing body appeared lowly and humble as he said, “I’m willing to trade all my cattle and sheep in exchange for Duo’erlan’s longevity.”

Amu’er raised his head slightly. His thumb ring slid along his Adam’s apple. He laughed in spite of himself. “Chagan, so you heard those rumors.”

“My son killed Suhebashou. If Dalantai wants an eye for an eye, I can offer up my head. The Hulu Tribe is willing to pay the price for its contemptible act.” Chagan straightened up his back. The yellow sand of the desert had added a blackish-yellow tint to his aged face. He continued, “But he cannot take away my daughter.”

Duo’erlan was Chagan’s only daughter. She was the precious pearl of the Hulu Tribe. The Hulu Tribe did not have strong, sturdy horses, nor did they have eagles that could soar in the skies, but they had the protection the Heavenly God of Chiti bestowed upon them. The Hulu Tribe lived deep in the desert, and it had the most fertile oasis in the desert, Lake Chiti. In the legends, they were the children who grew up drinking the milk of the Heavenly God of Chiti. Duo’erlan was born with eyes like the waters of Lake Chiti, and the Hulu Tribe regarded her as the dew of the morning. She was the most carefree girl of all in the entire desert.

“Duo’erlan married Hasen, so she’s no longer the precious pearl of Lake Chiti, but the precious pearl of the six tribes in the desert.” Holding on to the handle of his chair, Amu’er stood up, his broad shoulders shouldering the slanting ray of sunlight leaking in. “If Hasen can’t even protect his own wife, then he’s unworthy of being Duo’erlan’s husband and does not deserve to have the allegiance of the Hulu Tribe. Chagan, my good friend, stand up and hold your scimitar tight. Watch that lad. If he dares to slight your daughter, you can kill him.”

Chagan kowtowed, the wrinkles on his forehead pressing against the ground. “I serve the Great Hero, and I firmly believe that the Heroic Eagle, Hasen, will not betray Duo’erlan. Because his father is the most valiant warrior of all in the great desert.”

Amu’er walked slowly. When he reached the flap of the tent, he was still scratching at his Adam’s apple. He gazed at the yellowing sky awash in the sunset glow. His old thumb ring rolled over his Adam’s apple, revealing a scar that had been left there. This was a mark Xiao Fangxu left him more than a decade ago in the eastern mountain ranges of Hongyan.

“The Youxiong Tribe has been blinded by the wind of the snowy pass. Dalantai is still reveling in their past glory.” Amu’er looked back and said to Chagan. “Without their Valiant Tiger, Suhebashou, the Youxiong Tribe cannot stop my Hasen at all.”

Bayin received a reply from Hasen. He read it over quickly and drank a bowl of milk tea after he was done. He sat cross-legged before the territory of the Youxiong Tribe, right in the wilderness, with a book spread open on his knees, as he requested Dalantai to meet him again.

A warrior from the Youxiong Tribe waved his hand at him to drive him away. "Get lost."

Bayin drew a line before his knees with a finger and said, "I'm in the territory of the Qingshu Tribe and so have not affronted you."

"You're blocking us from taking a piss," the warrior said.

"Are you going to take a piss like an animal before the eyes of the heavenly gods?" Bayin looked at his book. "As long as Dalantai would see me once again, this piece of Gobi can be given to you people to use as a cesspit."

Bayin was a "wise one". He carried a book with him, and that meant he was the heavenly god's eye of wisdom traversing the great desert. As long as he was not so inclined, no one could pull down his pants to take a piss before his eyes. Achi and Huhelu did not respect Bayin, and so they both died. This gave Bayin even more of an air of mystery.

This was the fifth day Bayin had been keeping watch here. Dalantai finally agreed to see him again.

Bayin gathered up his book and said to Dalantai, "Honorable..."

"The Libei Armored Cavalry has already reached the Bianjun Commandery. There's not much time left for Hasen." Dalantai took off his boots and stepped barefoot on the yellow earth. "Has he killed his wife?"

Bayin slipped out Hasen's letter and made to hand it over. Dalantai raised a hand to stop him and shook his head. "I'm illiterate. You read it."

"The Heroic Eagle wishes me to tell you," Bayin said. "He—"

Bayin was midway through when he heard the sound of horse hooves coming from afar. Dalantai stood up and walked ahead, but before he could open his mouth, he saw a burgundy stallion charging straight into the Youxiong Tribe's territory before eventually stopping in front of Dalantai.

"It was by the lakeside of Lake Chiti that I heard the honorable Dalantai wants my head." Carrying her horsewhip in hand, Duo'erlan looked at Dalantai amid the restless treading of the horse. "If you want to use the Valiant Tiger, Suhebashou, to coerce my husband with, you should ask for my consent first."

“And so you ride your horse into my territory.” Admiring this Flower of Chiti in the legends, Dalantai asked, “Because you’ve decided to use your own head to win this victory for your husband?”

Bayin jolted to his feet and saw that the warriors within the territory had also stood up. He hurriedly walked over and raised his arms to protect Duo’erlan’s horse. To Dalantai, he said, “No, this is not what the Heroic Eagle intends...”

“My elder brother killed your chief.” Duo’erlan raised her hand and wiped the dust on her face with the back of her hand. She had been on the go for several days. “Gegenhasi is the best brother in the world, but he is not worthy of being called a hero. If you want to avenge Suhebashou, you can take away my head, but this is a feud between the Youxiong Tribe and the Hulu Tribe, not your feud with Hasen. You should speak to me.”

Saying so, Duo’erlan tossed the dagger on her waist to the ground.

“I am willing to use my death to apologize to the Youxiong Tribe for Gegenhasi’s rash act. Dalantai is a good man. Take up this dagger and kill me, and our Hulu Tribe would have thus paid off this debt.”

Dalantai picked up the small dagger. It was exquisite and pretty, inlaid with cat’s eye gems, with a kind of incisive yet innocent beauty, just like Duo’erlan.

“You are very courageous. If Gegenhasi was just as courageous as you, the Youxiong Tribe and the Hulu Tribe could have become brothers years ago.”

“There is no ‘if’ in this world. Take my head to offer as a sacrifice for the Valiant Tiger, then pick up your scimitar and pledge allegiance to the Heroic Eagle.” Duo’erlan dismounted from her horse. The hem of her skirt fluttered in the night wind as she walked a few steps towards Dalantai. “The opportunity for the Youxiong Tribe is right now.”

Dalantai spread open his palm and held Duo’erlan’s dagger as if he was holding a flower in full bloom. He looked at Duo’erlan. Strangely enough, the expression in her eyes made it seem as if he was looking at his own daughter. The frigid wind of the night sent the banner of the Youxiong Tribe flapping. With the air of a man who had been through the vicissitudes of life, he said, “Silly girl, this debt can never be repaid.”

Bayin took the opportunity to say, “The Heroic Eagle can promise Dalantai that whether or not the Youxiong Tribe is willing to send troops to the Bianjun Commandery, he is willing to return the Youxiong Tribe’s homeland. He will also give the Youxiong Tribe all the cattle and sheep he owns as an apology on behalf of the Hulu Tribe. But if Dalantai insists on taking his wife away from him, then he will fight to the bitter end with the Youxiong Tribe at the risk of his life.”

Dalantai’s always narrowed eyes widened a little. He had heard similar words before.

Just two days ago, Hairigu had sat in the tent and said respectfully to him, “The Prefectural Lord of Zhongbo extends his arms to Dalantai. We’re willing to seize back the homeland for the Youxiong Tribe, and until then, Duanzhou is also willing to supply sufficient grains to the Youxiong Tribe.”

These people all knew that the Youxiong Tribe wanted back their homeland. They preferred to remain in their old place and guard the snowy peaks on Suhebashou’s behalf.

Dalantai clasped his hands and said, benevolently and briskly, “The Youxiong Tribe, in receiving what it is due, is willing to fight for you.”

It was the same answer he had given Hairigu.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 245: RELAY STATION

It was the second quarter of the hour of zi, when the stars hung over the vast plains.

Xiao Chiye stood on the sand dune and drank his remaining On Horseback. The strong wine gushed down his throat, and he swallowed it slowly, letting the pungent spiciness linger in his mouth for a long time. Once night fell, the wind would intensify, and yellow sand buried Lang Tao Xue Jin's hooves. The moment the second quarter passed, Xiao Chiye saw Hairigu returning.

Hairigu dismounted from his horse and removed the veil covering his mouth and nose. Turning his head aside, he spat a few mouthfuls of sand and said, "Dalantai has agreed to it."

Xiao Chiye did not speak. Behind him, Chen Yang asked, "What terms did you offer him?"

"We gave him the grasslands to the east of Suotian Pass. That's the homeland of the Youxiong Tribe. Dalantai wants to go home."

"You gave them a vast expanse of grasslands." Xiao Chiye repeated.

Hairigu lifted both hands slightly and said to Xiao Chiye, "His Lordship wants to give the Youxiong Tribe the Hanshe Tribe's territory, which is even more fertile. I think what I've negotiated is even better of a deal."

"The Hanshe Tribe's territory is near Libei. Moving the Youxiong Tribe there makes it easier to control them. This is the outcome Lanzhou wants, but you pushed them back to the eastern side of the snowy peaks." Xiao

Chiye sealed the wine pouch tight and tossed it to Chen Yang beside him. "We have no eyes on the eastern side of the snowy peaks to keep watch on them."

Hairigu chased a few steps after Xiao Chiye and said, "The Youxiong Tribe treasures old ties. No matter how fertile the Hanshe Tribe's territory is, it will be hard for it to shake their determination. Second Master, only the eastern side of the snowy peaks can sway Dalantai. Besides, the grasslands there are almost gone. They still have to move north, eventually."

"You're playing tricks." Chen Yang turned sideways to block Hairigu with his chest, then raised an arm to create some distance between them, preventing Hairigu from continuing to chase after Xiao Chiye. "You didn't talk to Dalantai about the Qingshu Tribe's territory."

As bait, the Qingshu Tribe's territory was also Zhongbo's bargaining chip. Going by Shen Zechuan's game plan, Hairigu ought to have first discussed the Qingshu Tribe's territory with Dalantai before finally throwing out the Hanshe Tribe's territory, but Hairigu did not do so. He knew to seek benefits for himself out of this. He wanted to swap out the Hanshe Tribe's territory for the grasslands on the eastern side of the snowy peaks, so that he could keep the fertile land for the Black Scorpions led by himself.

Xiao Chiye had already gotten on his horse. Chen Yang was still blocking Hairigu.

Hairigu could not shove Chen Yang away. He paced restlessly where he was and spread his arms resignedly at Chen Yang. "You should go and chat with Dalantai yourself and see if he'll move according to your presumptions."

Chen Yang corrected the position of his blade that Hairigu had bumped askew and said, "He's already moving according to your presumptions. You want the Hanshe Tribe's territory, and His Lordship will naturally give it to you, but not by resorting to such means. You've been with His Lordship for so long, and yet you don't understand your master at all."

Looking as if he did not wish to argue with Chen Yang, Hairigu turned his back to Chen Yang.

Chen Yang took a few steps back and made to chase after Xiao Chiye's horse.

With his face to the plains, Hairigu then said in the Biansha tongue, “The way you are acting all like a dog is really very devout.”

Having said that, he looked back and flashed a smile at Chen Yang as though nothing had happened.

Chen Yang stepped onto the saddle and flashed a smile at Hairigu too. As he turned his horse around, he similarly answered in the Biansha tongue, “The envious expression in the eyes of a bastard is very devout as well.”

Fuck!

The Biansha words Chen Yang spoke in an accent close to the Hanshe Tribe gave Hairigu a fright. Before he arrived here, no one in Zhongbo understood his words in the Biansha tongue.

“There’s nothing about me that’s outstanding, except that I’m a pretty quick learner of the Biansha language. What you learned in Gedale was in the Liaoying Tribe’s accent, which, in truth, doesn’t really sound nice,” Chen Yang politely said. “Bark one word more, and I’ll smash your head in.”

Caught off guard, Hairigu obediently nodded and watched as Chen Yang rode his horse away and kicked up dust all over his face.

Xiao Chiye returned to the Bianjun Commandery but did not find Qi Zhuyin in the tent. He circled around and found the commander-in-chief in another tent. Qi Zhuyin had just woken up, and upon hearing movements, leaned out to whistle at Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye, with Langli Blade in hand, was in a quandary over whether to advance or retreat.

The rouge on Qi Zhuyin’s lips had been partially applied, and the pulps of both her little fingers were stained with this bit of red. However, she was not applying it herself. Instead, she leaned over and handed the job over to Hua Xiangyi. Hua Xiangyi rose and carefully applied the rouge evenly on the commander-in-chief’s lips.

“...This color is really pretty.” Hua Xiangyi’s voice was soft and pleasing. “It suits Commander-in-chief Qi just right. It’s not conspicuous at night.” She applied that last bit and turned her head to ask Xiao Chiye with a smile, “Pretty?”

Xiao Chiye folded his arms and looked for a long time. In a rare moment of hesitancy, he answered, “...Not bad.”

It wasn't that Qi Zhuyin had never put on makeup before. When she was in her regular wear at home, or attending a banquet in her court attire, she would put on a little makeup. But no matter how superb Xiao Chiye's eyesight was, he could not tell the difference between this rouge and the one that the commander-in-chief usually applied.

"You don't understand." With her slender, delicate fingers, Hua Xiangyi brushed open the handkerchief on her lap to reveal a small carved mirror inlaid with pearls that had been wrapped within. She picked it up and held it up for Qi Zhuyin to take a look.

Qi Zhuyin wiped her hands on the handkerchief. She could only see her own lips and chin in the mirror. She smiled and said, "It's pretty."

Xiao Chiye waited for a moment before Qi Zhuyin let down the tent flap and stepped out.

"Eldest Madam is here to work out the accounts for me," Qi Zhuyin explained.

Xiao Chiye coughed into the expansive night and said, "Oh..."

Xiao Chiye glanced at Qi Zhuyin out of the corners of his eyes. The commander-in-chief was young, but she also wasn't young anymore, at least for a woman; she had long passed the marriageable age. Xiao Jiming and Lu Guangbai were on good terms with her, but they never asked her about her marriage, because everyone knew that Qi Zhuyin could not get married.

"Third Missy's mental arithmetic is outstanding. I heard about it when I was in Qudu. The accounts in your residence are complicated and tedious. With her help, it will be a lot easier."

"The Empress Dowager has fallen, and her status in Qidong is not like before. Once Xue Yanqing is done investigating the City of Chuancheng, it will be the City of Dicheng's turn. The Hua clan is in imminent danger. I'm worried my father's concubines at home will create a scene and stir up trouble if I don't let her stay by my side." There was still a lingering fragrance of rouge on Qi Zhuyin. She did not continue explaining along this line, but instead teased, "And besides, I am this fond of girls."

Xiao Chiye stood still. Both of them had already ascended their way up the city wall.

"Your Scorpion is back," Qi Zhuyin said.

Xiao Chiye pointed to the southeast and said, "The Youxiong Tribe is willing to make way and open up a path for you. They want to retreat to the grasslands on the eastern side of Suotian Pass, to return to their original land.”

The fire reflected Qi Zhuyin’s raised face. Hua Xiangyi was right. This color of rouge was inconspicuous, and it resembled Qi Zhuyin’s natural color when tinted by the color of the night. With a pensive expression, she said, “Dalantai is foolish.”

Only a fool would give up the Qingshu Tribe’s territory and return to the eastern side of the snowy peaks that had already been engulfed whole by the yellow sands of the desert.

“He’s not foolish,” Xiao Chiye said. “He makes way for you with the intent for you to take a detour to Gedale. Once you get there, he will be the hand that chokes off your retreat path, and when the time comes, he can make any demands of you as he pleases.”

“Then Dalantai is still a fool, because you and I can see through such an obvious and easy-to-understand tactic.” Qi Zhuyin tapped her fingertips on the side of her arms as she looked out into the depths of the night. “You’ve been hanging out with Lu Guangbai for a long time and learning all about his ‘earthiness’. You want to dig deep into the earth when you stand on the ground, and you itch to commit to heart the terrain stretching for thousands of li all around. However, you have overlooked the tribe itself.”

Qi Zhuyin skirted around Xiao Chiye. Bracing herself on the battlement, she nimbly vaulted onto it, then stepped on the opening and bent over to inspect the mechanical crossbow at the top of the wall.

“Dalantai makes way for me. My guess is that he won’t obstruct me. The Youxiong Tribe doesn’t have that many warriors. Dalantai can only choose to concentrate his military force; otherwise, he won’t be able to ward off attacks from any party.”

Xiao Chiye thought for a moment. “You’re saying that Dalantai is going to concentrate his forces to attack some other places?”

“When I leave the Bianjun Commandery, half of the 40,000 garrison troops here have to leave too. Without Lu Guangbai, there’s no commanding general who can engage in a to-and-forth battle with them. If they don’t attack now, then what are they going to wait for?” Qi Zhuyin said.

“Even so, it’s not worth it, jiejie,” Xiao Chiye said. “Since Dalantai doesn’t have sufficient troops, then once he takes down the Bianjun Commandery, you’ll soon be on the journey back. He will also be attacked by the Cangjun Commandery Garrison Troops from the rear. There's no way he can hold on to the Bianjun Commandery at all. If he goes through all that trouble to get here, it won't be just for the sake of food, like Hasen."

Qi Zhuyin straightened up, and as she turned her head aside, the wind mussed up her hair. She did not continue to make further inferences like Lu Guangbai did, but said, "Then we shall give it a try."

After Xiao Chiye left the battle zone, Libei started to show signs of exhaustion. However, Hasen's onslaught of attack never abated. Lu Guangbai could only hold down the fort and have Mount Luo increase its vigilance. The eagle eyes of Duanzhou could not see the banks of the Chashi River. It was at this time Huo Lingyun quietly left Duanzhou.

Huo Lingyun's squad was small in number. They were all Imperial Bodyguards, taciturn men of few words who traveled simply and rode the ponies they had captured from Achi. They headed north along the Chashi River, resting at sunrise and moving after sunset.

The wind was dry tonight. Huo Lingyun finished the last drop of water in his canteen and wiped his mouth as he sat on horseback with eyes in front.

If only that annoying chap, Fei Sheng, was here.

Huo Lingyun hung the water canteen back on the back of his horse. As he lacked Fei Sheng's observational insights, he was very slow to react in the darkness. Yet, he could only make his moves at night.

"Where exactly are we going?" An Imperial Bodyguard following Huo Lingyun took off his fur collar and poured water over himself. "We've been heading north for five days."

"We'll stay here," Huo Lingyun said, "until we can walk out with our eyes closed."

Whenever they came within the vicinity of the Shasan Camp while heading north, they would turn back. However, they would not return to Duanzhou but continue going north on the same route, and so on and so forth. The Imperial Bodyguards kept silent. Before setting off, Qiao Tianya had given them a dressing down, so no one refuted Huo Lingyun during the journey.

The ponies had great stamina and endurance. They were not tired even after walking in the Gobi desert for several days. With their thick necks, they looked stupid, but the Imperial Bodyguards had already gotten used to their speed, which was at odds with their appearance. These were all splendid horses.

When it was almost dawn, Huo Lingyun stopped on the riverbank. He let the ponies quench their thirst, while he himself squatted at the side to wash his face.

The water of the river in the early morning was icy cool, and a splash to the face proved to be invigorating.

Huo Lingyun opened his water canteen and pressed it into the river. Under the gurgling sounds, he suddenly saw a flash of dark red lurching out. The fingers he had been pressing down came into contact with something icy cold but soft. Then, black hair floated up alongside the red.

“A body!” An Imperial Bodyguard who was similarly washing his face shouted in a low voice and yanked at the hair to drag the body out of the water.

Huo Lingyun turned over the body, whose face was bloated from being soaked in the water. He wrung out the muddy slit and started establishing the identity of the body.

“He has been stripped of his armor,” the Imperial Bodyguard said quickly. “He died upstream.”

Huo Lingyun pulled apart the clothing on the body and jolted to his feet. “...He’s an Armored Cavalryman.”

An Armored Cavalryman was galloping on the bridleway connecting Mount Luo to Shasan Camp. He tottered on the verge of falling amid the jolts and bumps, leaving a long trail of blood on the ground where his horse’s hooves passed. His helmet concealed his face from view. He was just an unknown junior soldier. His lips moved, but all he could do was to breathe his words.

“The...”

The horse galloped into the relay station fifty li south of Shasan Camp. He tumbled off and crashed into the ground.

“The riding stable requests...”

He hung on until this point, but breathed his last before he could finish his words. As long as he could reach this place, it was a victory. The Armored Cavalry at the relay station would immediately convey the news to Shasan Camp, and reinforcements would head south. But then, the relay station was deathly still. Corpses were strewn everywhere, including the falcons in the falcon cage. There were no longer any survivors here.

Waves of heat shimmered.

Not even the cry of a bird could be heard.

CHAPTER 246: NIGHT DISPATCH

Huo Lingyun got on his horse. Pulling his reins, he bellowed, “Head over to the Luosha Relay Station!”

The riding stable on Mount Luo was too far away. Even the ponies would not be able to make it there on time. Huo Lingyun could only opt for the Luosha Relay Station, which was closer. That place was near the Shasan Camp, and it was a supply station for the transmission of messages between Mount Luo and Libei.

The ponies’ panting began to intensify. The weather was too hot, and the physically strong and healthy Imperial Bodyguards all had to pour water over themselves to avoid getting heatstroke. Huo Lingyun rode northwest from the riverbank of the Chashi River for a full four hours. By the time he was able to see the relay station, it was already dark.

“Dead bodies.” An Imperial Bodyguard raised a finger to scratch his nose and said from the back, “It’s all dead bodies here.”

An armored cavalryman sprawled face-down before the open main gates of the relay station. He had already been dead for several hours, and his blood had soaked the ground black. It would not be long before the body under the heavy armor would begin to stink.

The Imperial Bodyguard dismounted from his horse. Without turning over the armored cavalryman’s corpse, he crouched down to examine it for a moment before saying to Huo Lingyun, “He was a real man.”

Huo Lingyun looked at the arrows on the armored cavalryman’s back and nodded.

There were two arrows on the armored cavalryman's back. It was with these two arrows in tow that he had galloped his way to the relay station, where he finally closed his eyes.

The Imperial Bodyguard stood up and covered his mouth and nose. With his other hand, he shone the torch forward. "This place—"

His voice came to an abrupt halt.

Corpses were strewn all over the relay station. The postal relay stationmaster had been hung up on the flagpole, like tattered rags hanging out to dry in the silent night. Huo Lingyun took over the torch and moved in for a closer look, only to realize that the stationmaster's head had been hacked off.

"The horses have all been hacked to death," the Imperial Bodyguard illuminating the stable said. "Even if someone survived, he won't be able to make it to Mount Luo and Shasan Camp before daybreak... The falcons are dead too."

The door to the falcon cage had not been securely closed. Falcons that had yet to break free of their ankle chains all had their necks snapped. There were no survivors in the Luosha Relay Station. Even the stray dogs they had been feeding here had all been slashed to death.

The Biansha Cavalry had been here.

Grasping the torch in hand, Huo Lingyun fell deep in thought.

Mount Luo's riding stables, after its establishment, became a fledgling information hub between Libei and Zhongbo. For that reason, Shen Zechuan built it to be exceedingly solid. Eight hundred people were stationed at the Luosha Relay Station, with not only the Libei Armored Cavalry, but also the Zhongbo Garrison Troops. It was equivalent to a small-scale military camp. Emergency reporting points had been set up on the four-way bridle paths, and the watchtower could keep a watch on three sides. Several days ago, Lu Guangbai had even asked the Luosha bridleways to step up vigilance. There was no negligence to speak of at all.

"The Biansha Cavalry are skilled at launching surprise attacks," the Imperial Bodyguard said. "Back then, they launched a surprise attack on the Bianbo Camp..."

"Bianbo Camp." Huo Lingyu pivoted around and repeated, "Bianbo Camp... Bianbo Camp!"

In the sixth month of last year, when the Biansha Cavalry mounted a surprise attack on the Bianbo Camp, they had taken a detour from the south and used the Mount Luo path to pass through. Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye later blocked off all access to that path, but there was no way the area near the Chashi River to the east could be choked off.

“The Biansha Cavalry came here before during the reign of Xiande, and they know the terrain here like the back of their hand. The relay station connects Mount Luo and the Shasan Camp, and it stands right on the path the Biansha Cavalry once used to head for Mount Luo.” Huo Lingyun jumped up the stairs in a few steps and pushed the door open.

“For them to be able to launch a surprise attack here away from spying eyes, their numbers must have been small.” The Imperial Bodyguard gave a helping hand and lowered the station master from the flagpole. “Very likely, the ones who infiltrated their way in are the Scorpions.”

Whether or not it was the Scorpions, Hasen cut off the relay station because he did not want news of the surprise attack on Mount Luo to make its way to Libei. He was delaying the reinforcements. But this group of Biansha Cavalry who had launched the surprise attack did not stop. Based on the direction of the bridleway, Huo Lingyun guessed Hasen planned to have this group of people continue on south to directly sever the connection between Dunzhou and Duanzhou, so that Duanzhou would find itself isolated and cut off from help.

“This place is closer to the Shasan Camp.” Huo Lingyun turned around and descended the stairs, then whistled to summon his horse. “We’ll continue to head north. We can reach Shasan Camp before daybreak and ask Libei for reinforcements.”

Huo Lingyun could not make it in time to Dunzhou. He could only choose one path, and that was to get the Libei Armored Cavalry at the Shasan Camp to head south immediately to assist Duanzhou. But this meant that Duanzhou and Dunzhou had lost all information, especially Duanzhou, which would be the first to bear the brunt. If anything were to go wrong with Shasan Camp’s reinforcements, Duanzhou would face complete annihilation.

Huo Lingyun cracked his horsewhip.

Time for him was pressing. He had to be fast!

The Imperial Bodyguards galloped away as if they were chasing after the stars and trying to catch up with the moon. They broke through the silence on the bridleway and moved fast among the shadows of the trees. Huo Lingyun’s breathing was slightly urgent. As he had been riding on the horse for a long period of time, his inner thighs were burning with stinging pain. The saddles were damp, and their cheeks were slick with sweat. Not having the time to rest these few days, they were all like strings stretched taut with tension.

Hurry!

Huo Lingyun clenched his horsewhip tightly and raised his arm amidst the jolts and bumps. But before he could lash out, the horse under him neighed as its knees buckled and it went down. Huo Lingyun promptly covered his head with his arms and rolled to the ground. Specters dashed among the shadows of the trees on both sides of the bridle path. Huo Lingyun leaped to his feet and drew his blade out as he listened to those rapid footsteps breaking through the bushes to lunge at him.

“Tripping rope!” An Imperial Bodyguard following close behind him reined in his horse and shouted, “There’s an ambush!”

Huo Lingyun held up his blade to parry the blow, but to no avail. With his body, the other party slammed Huo Lingyun off his feet. Huo Lingyun turned aside and grazed past the ground to roll beside the roots of a tree. The moment the rustling of wind behind him sped up, Huo Lingyun held on to the root with one arm and made use of it to slide up and raise both legs to dodge the blow from the blade.

Scorpions... no, Huo Lingyun hissed through clenched teeth, “It’s the Biansha Cavalry!”

The elites of the Hanshe Tribe!

The elites moved swiftly as they outflanked them, like a tightly woven net closing in on them. The rustling of the footsteps was abnormally uniform, like snakes writhing in unison. Even the traces they left behind while passing through the sandy grounds were so identical it gave one the creeps.

The scimitars on the left side slashed towards the knees of the Imperial Bodyguards’ horses, but unexpectedly, they were intercepted midway by the Xiuchun Blades.<sup>1</sup> The Imperial Bodyguards kicked out at the Biansha Cavalrymen’s chests, then drew their blades out and spun around to land on the ground. At the same time their soles touched the ground, their blades flashed like a sudden burst of daylight to slit the Biansha Cavalrymen’s throats. Then they stomped on the ground and flipped back atop their horses again, completing the entire sequence of action in one smooth move!

The elites who did not succeed took half a step back in unison. One of them touched his throat and said, "The Imperial Bodyguards!"

An Imperial Bodyguard turned over his blade and wiped the blood on it on the back of his waist at the same time he slid his arm out and said, "Imperial Bodyguards? We are now called the Imperial Cavalry!"

Huo Lingyun's horse could not stand up in its shock. He dashed a few steps and grabbed the outstretched arm of the Imperial Bodyguard to leap onto the Imperial Bodyguard's horse.

"Libei has their hands full right now." The Imperial Bodyguard tugged at the reins of his horse even as they were tightly encircled. "Biansha has also laid ambushes here. Even if we make it to the Shasan Camp, it will be too late!"

"Return—" Before Huo Lingyun could finish his words, he held his blade with both hands and abruptly swung it in a semicircle to strike away a scimitar that had suddenly come attacking. "Return to Duanzhou!"

Going to Libei was impossible now!

"Turn around." Huo Lingyun hastily wiped away the sweat on his face. "Break out of the encirclement from the south."

Hasen was too cautious. He slaughtered everyone in the Luosha Relay Station and did not even spare the horses and falcons. Yet he also left his elites on the bridle path to the north to guard against survivors who could possibly appear after slipping through his ambush. But this also gave Huo Lingyun the opportunity, as the number of elites Hasen left here was small.

"Fuck." The Imperial Bodyguard shook off the drops of blood on his blade. "This blade was bestowed by the emperor, and now it's all jagged!"

The horse stomped its hooves, and the Imperial Bodyguard yanked the reins to forcibly turn it around. The Biansha Cavalry at the side had already lunged over. The saddle slipped to the right, and unable to bear the weight of the gravitational force, the horse tilted over to the right as well. Huo Lingyun bent his elbow and slammed it into the Biansha Cavalryman's face. Meanwhile, cavalymen on the left climbed their way up like locusts. The Imperial Bodyguard held his blade up to parry a scimitar, and was thrown off by the force of the blow.

The Imperial Bodyguard fell to the ground, and several scimitars instantly came hacking down on him. He bellowed with all his might and propped up his Xiuchun Blade with both hands. Under that ear-piercing sound of friction as blade scraped against blade, he lifted it up, the veins bulging on the back of his hands.

"I can't hold on anymore..." The Imperial Bodyguard shouldered the force of several men as he lay on the ground with his neck raised, panting heavily and sweating profusely. With protruding veins on his temples bulging, he strained himself to say, "Buddy... fight..."

Huo Lingyun, however, rode the horse away.

The Imperial Bodyguard almost deflated with disappointment and cursed, "Motherfucker..."

With the horse, Huo Lingyun slammed away the Biansha Cavalrymen. All that lay between his tightly pursed lips was the taste of salt. That was not sweat, but the blood from having bitten through his lips. After galloping for some distance, he spun around and kept his blade away into its sheath. Then he rode straight back, his horse's hooves trampling through the superimposed human shadows.

The Imperial Bodyguard's slipping arms could not block the blow anymore. The Biansha Cavalryman's head was almost right in his face. At the critical juncture, the pungent smell of gunpowder wafted into the Imperial Bodyguard's nostrils, choking him. The deafening explosion was accompanied by the splattering of blood that spurt all over the Imperial Bodyguard's face.

Huo Lingyun leaned down to grab the Imperial Bodyguard's hand and brought him back onto the horse.

"Break through the encirclement." Huo Lingyun's emotions were running at an all-time high as he took the lead with his smoking firearm and charged his way out from the south, shouting, "Break through the encirclement!"

Yin Chang tilted his head back and downed the wine. He finished it, then belched several times in succession. Leaning over the battlement, he asked the soldiers guarding the gate, "Any more? This wine is delicious!"

The soldier guarding the gate shifted a few steps and got a clear look at Yin Chang's face under the firelight and moonlight. "Nope. Elder, you should drink less. We are still on duty!"

"I won't drink when it's break time." Yin Chang's legs felt a little weak. He drunkenly swayed to his feet and strained himself to look at the torches on the battlements. “Aye, why is it short of bows and arrows here? Men, fill them in, quick!”

Fei Sheng had yet to walk his way over to the city wall when he heard Yin Chang making a big hoo-ha. He hid the newly purchased wine underneath, kicked it under a mechanical crossbow, and pulled a piece of fabric over it. Then he menacingly headed up and lifted Yin Chang by the back of his collar. “Sure. Someone will do it right away. You go back to bed!”

Yin Chang’s heels slid across the ground as he was carried away like this. He rubbed his reddened nose and grumbled, “Why isn’t General Lu here yet? I’ve been waiting for so many days just to see him again, and I even drank so many rounds of wine.”

The last time Yin Chang went to the war zone with Xiao Chiye, he had been very excited to see Lu Guangbai. He dragged Lu Guangbai to drink with him, drinking until Lu Guangbai puked thrice in a night and passed out cold in his tent on the second day. Without saying another word, Zuo Qianqiu dispatched someone to send Yin Chang back.

Fei Sheng, unable to stand the stench of a drunkard, waved his palm as he pinched his nose and said, “Not another word from you. I’m not going to embarrass myself.”

Displeased, Yin Chang waved his arms and tilted his head back intending to look at Fei Sheng. Stubbornly, he said, “Is drinking wine an embarrassment to you? Bah, you are a fine one to talk about being an embarrassment.”

Fei Sheng dragged him to the bottom and exchanged his authority token with the duty room. Patrols were strict these days, and he had to spend some effort signing in for duty.

Yin Chang took the opportunity to look for wine, using his nose that could not smell to sniff around as he muttered, “Where is it hidden? Here, right...?”

He tucked away the corner of his robe and kneeled on the ground. With his butt sticking up, he looked under the mounted crossbow.

Fei Sheng was indeed still a little too green.

Cocking his head, Yin Chang stretched his hand in to reach for the wine, muttering, “My little precious, aye, why so far away, aye...”

Fei Sheng looked back and set down the brush, ready to shout at the old man to stop, but right at this moment, he heard a very soft “click”. His ears were so sensitive that he could even hear the wind clearly. He could not help but turn his head to the side and listen again with bated breath and rapt attention.

The banner fell, and the wind near the city gate stopped.

Yin Chang finally reached the wine, but instead of raking it out, he maintained his posture and crouched on the ground to sniff the smell of the land. Before Fei Sheng could react, Yin Chang bellowed, “ENEMY ATTACK—!”

The heavy rock from the catapult crashed into the top of the wall. A kickup of dust splattered all over. As Fei Sheng covered his head and avoided the debris, he heard the alarm sound from the watchtower. A soldier from the garrison troops raised the drum sticks and began pounding on the drum, shouting, “Enemy attack, enemy attack! Get the fuck out of bed!”

Fei Sheng pushed aside the soldiers and rushed up the city wall. When he got a clear look before Duanzhou, he sucked in a chilly breath.

Yin Chang climbed to his feet, patted a garrison troop passing through with the sheath of his blade, and barked, “Light up the beacon and report it posthaste to His Lordship.”

Yin Chang stomped up to the city gate and pulled over Fei Sheng.

“Take your authority token with you and lead the Imperial Cavalry to pack up and protect His Lordship and the various advisors.” Yin Chang’s reddened nose twitched twice. Without looking out of the city, he pointed to the smoke signal tower<sup>2</sup> at the side. “If the smoke signal here starts burning, then Xiaosheng, protect His Lordship and head west to Dunzhou!”

Shen Zechuan had yet to go to bed. He was under the lamp, pinching the center of his brows as he listened to Kong Ling speak on the matter of the dam when he heard chaos break out in the courtyard. Qiao Tianya lifted the bamboo blinds, and Ding Tao and Li Xiong followed him in. Kong Ling stood up and asked, “This...”

“Master,” Qiao Tianya secured his blade. “The Biansha Cavalry has mounted a surprise attack.”

The advisors in the hall all stood up with an exclamation of surprise. Yao Wenyu immediately looked at Shen Zechuan and said, “The reinforcements from Libei aren’t here yet.”

Shen Zechuan put down his arm and stared at the candlelight. After a moment, he said. “Duanzhou didn’t get any updates. Either the battle zone has fallen into the enemy's hands, or Mount Luo is lost to us."

Everyone in this room was a scholar. Those like Gao Zhongxiong who had never experienced war looked even more ghastly pale. They all looked at Shen Zechuan—the Prefectural Lord was everyone's pillar.

Shen Zechuan could not show fear at this moment. He set the lid of his teacup straight and rose to his feet. Ding Tao shook open the overcoat and made to drape it over Shen Zechuan, but Shen Zechuan turned his palm aside to block his attempt.

The Prefectural Lord said, "Get Yang Shan Xue."

CHAPTER 247: THE SOVEREIGN

“Where are the mounted scouts?!”

“Dead.” The garrison troops who had been startled awake followed closely behind Yin Chang. “All the scouts in the perimeter were wiped out. No one returned.”

Yin Chang filled his wine bag to the brim and hung it back at the side of his waist. As he slotted his blade, he spat, “Son of a bitch Hasen.”

No movement from the relay stations, and all the scouts were dead. Unable to get the news out, the reinforcements would not come.

“Reorganize the scouting squad,” Yin Chang said. “Wait for an opportunity to get out. We have to light up the smoke signal tower before daybreak. Only then will Libei, Dunzhou, and the Bianjun Commandery receive the news.”

Duanzhou once suffered a massacre because the scouts could not outrun the Biansha’s horses. That was why Shen Zechuan imitated the Bianjun Commandery’s Ten Thousand li Beacon Tower when he established the four-way bridleway of Duanzhou. As long as these three tower routes were lit, the three parties would know that Duanzhou was in imminent danger.

Yin Chang had only just lifted the flap of the tent when he heard the “thump, thump, thump” pounding of the battle drums outside the city.

The Biansha Cavalry was sounding the drums!

Yin Chang broke into a run towards the top of the city wall. As he ran, he shouted with all his might at the top of his voice, “READY—”

The archers between the battlements drew their bowstrings in unison, holding their breaths as they focused their gaze outside of the city.

Cylindrical drums had been secured on both sides of the Biansha Cavalry's ponies, its reverberating beats through the night serving as the first sign of an impending assault. Just as the drumbeats were about to stop after hitting a feverish pitch, the ponies snorted hot puffs of air and charged.

Yin Chang immediately waved his hands and continued to roar, "Release the arrows!"

Unexpectedly, the charging Biansha Cavalry instantly split into two flanks, revealing the shield-bearing infantry behind. The infantry moved swiftly against the rain of arrows and pressed in towards the city gate.

Duanzhou faced the east. Its terrains were open and expansive, and it was near the Chashi River too. Shen Zechuan was digging canals here to make a trench, intending to construct a moat that could protect the city. But time was tight this year. Only the ditch at the east-facing main gate had begun to take shape, and the waters from the Chashi River had yet to be diverted over as well. Xiao Chiye cautioned Shen Zechuan prior to his departure south, and so Shen Zechuan removed the square bricks at the bottom of the ditch and replaced them with the caltrops the Libei Army used.

The city gate opened. Yin Chang led the Duanzhou Garrison Troops and charged out to remove the passage planks on top of the trench before the Biansha Cavalry stormed them. Without the passage planks, the Biansha Cavalry would have no way of crossing over the trench to advance through the city gate.

As soon as the rain of arrows from the top of the city walls stopped, the kerosene cans started burning.

Dragging the passage planks as he retreated, Yin Chang continued to shout, "Smash the cans!"

The kerosene cans on the battlements were smashed in unison, and the flames suddenly flared. The garrison troops leaned forward and threw the kerosene cans down with all their might. Oil splashed all over the infantry's shields, which went up in flames with a bang, but Yin Chang did not rejoice, for he had seen the infantry scatter to make way for the concealed head cart.<sup>3</sup>

Shit!

This kind of siege wagon was originally used as a cover for the digging of ditches. It had a screen shield in front, and an assault wagon at the back.

The head cart in the middle could shield soldiers digging the earth from the arrows. Other than that, it also had a prominent function, which was to extinguish fires. The infantry hidden inside the head cart lifted the roof and emerged, using their daggers to slash through the cowhide sacks that contained water from the river. In no time, they were able to contain the fire started by the kerosene cans.

Yin Chang now had a clear grasp on the other party's aim. Hasen had used the infantry to deplete the arrows and kerosene cans of the garrison troops, as well as pushed the infantry before the trench, all to set the stage for the Biansha Cavalry who were poised for action at the back.

"Archers, stand by—"

The words had only just left Yin Chang's mouth when the infantry raised their shields once again. But Yin Chang had no intention of releasing the arrows at this moment. He drew his blade and led the garrison troops in a mad charge forward before the trench, where he sprang out like an old lion under the astonished gaze of the Biansha Cavalry.

"Block the trench!"

Yin Chang landed heavily on the brick wall of the trench, and his feet slid downward right at once. He clung onto the edge of the trench and kicked out with his legs a few times to crawl his way up. The garrison troops followed Yin Chang to fight their way into the infantry camp.

"Release the arrows!"

The rain of arrows came assailing down, and infantrymen who could not free their hands to raise their shields finally toppled over to the ground.

"Who is that?" A strong and sturdy man riding on a pony craned his head and saw Yin Chang's white hair through the crowd. He touched his own scimitar—his bare arm had a lizard tattoo on it. With considerable interest, he said in the Biansha tongue, "He's like a hero."

"The strong and hale Zhuoli doesn't know him," a cavalryman following by the man's side said. "He's the commander of the Cizhou Garrison Troops, the old general who captured Fanzhou for Shen Zechuan. His name is Yin Chang."

Imitating the Dazhou language, Zhuoli repeatedly read it out, "Yi, Yi Chang?"

"It means prosperity." The cavalryman soothed his restless horse.

"He has the courage of a lion." Zhuoli continued to size up Yin Chang. He clamped down tight on the horse's belly and moved forward unhurriedly amidst the swaying. “I want to fight with him.”

The cavalryman turned back to look at the Hongying banner at the back and advised, “Hasen’s orders have not been issued yet. Now is not the time for Zhuoli to launch an attack.”

Zhuoli exercised his strong, muscular arms and drew out his scimitar. “Hasen wants us to fight a quick battle. I can’t wait anymore.”

The garrison troops assembled the people inside the city. They were going to send the commoners over to the west gate, where the connecting bridle path led to Dunzhou. This was so that the commoners would still have the opportunity to flee before the east gate was breached and the massacre began. The commoners came one after another, looking to be in a hurry as they dragged their families with them. Occasionally, the wails of infants could be heard, although they were very quickly stifled. The number of people gathering increased, and repressed gasps all over followed in the wake of the bombarding from the east gate.

The advisors had long been waiting here. They carried with them simple luggage, as well as records under their arms—these were the fruit of their painstaking labor. Gao Zhongxiong’s ghastly pale complexion had yet to regain its color. He tugged his cloth bundle<sup>4</sup> tightly and stood together with the crowd of people.

Kong Ling was pushing Yao Wenyu, who had a bag containing a restless Hunu hanging in front of his chest.

As Yao Wenyu’s wheelchair passed by the commoners, he heard someone in the crowd sobbing. He turned his head to the side and fixed his eyes on the other party.

“M, Mister,” a lone widow with her child in her arms covered her mouth and nose. Amid her sobs, she asked in a small voice, “Is, is there going to be another massacre...”

The young gentleman’s gaze was gentle as he raised his hand to hand her his own handkerchief. He answered, “There won’t.”

Sobs rose all around. His words seemed unconvincing under the sound of combat and killing ahead.

“Humans won’t be able to outrun horses if the city were to be breached. We still have to die. Everyone will die.” A man squatting in the corner pulled at his only remaining donkey and said in an accent, “I shouldn’t have come to Duanzhou!”

“Where did the Garrison Troops go?” Someone came up to the gate and slapped on it. “Open the gate now and let us flee to Dunzhou. Every person who can flee before the city is breached is still a life saved!”

A clamor broke out among the crowd as they jostled their way towards the west gate. An air of uneasiness pervaded the night. Gao Zhongxiong had no choice but to lurch forward under the force of the pushes and shoves. Hugging his bundle close to him, he turned aside and jostled his way towards Kong Ling.

“Please don’t trample.” Gao Zhongxiong protected his bundle and tilted his head high to say, “Everyone, please don’t...”

The jostling crowd could not hear his voice at all. Someone’s elbow hit Gao Zhongxiong in the stomach. Losing his grip on his bundle, he watched as his paper and brushes scattered over the ground. He hurriedly bent down to pick them up, but there were too many people, and before he could reach them, the brushes broke under the trampling of feet.

Gao Zhongxiong said in an urgent voice, “Don’t step on the brushes! Don’t step on the brushes!”

Kong Ling could barely stand steady on his feet from all the jostling, and Yao Wenyu’s wheelchair proved to be an inconvenience here. It would be bad if Yao Wenyu were to get swept away into the crowd! Holding Hunu in one hand and pulling at the wheelchair with his other hand, Kong Ling said around him, “Where are the guards? Hurry over to protect Yuanzhuo!”

The wheels of Yao Wenyu’s wheelchair got stuck on a hard object, making a loud clang and nearly overturning from the impact. Yao Wenyu turned his gaze and looked at the crowd. Moonlight, in its untimely silence, cascaded down along his sleeves and robe to the ground.

The slapping on the gate intensified, with yells of “open the gate” everywhere. The memory of the massacre in Duanzhou was so deeply ingrained that they could not see the light in the darkness. The more savage the fighting ahead was, the more everyone lost confidence.

“Oh, blast it!” Gao Zhongxiong angrily flung his sleeves. Giving up on his brushes, he reached out to grab the wheelchair and brought it before himself. Blocking the waves of people, he cursed, “Stop jostling! People are getting hurt! What’s the hurry? The city hasn’t been breached yet. His Lordship stands before us!”

Shouts promptly rang out all around. “Where did His Lordship go?”

“Where did Shen Zechuan go?”

“No soldiers. No guards. Did he run?!”

How would Gao Zhongxiong know it would turn out this way? He hurriedly said, “His Lordship is...”

“Shen Zechuan fled!” Someone stomped their feet and fumed, “I don’t see him!”

The atmosphere seemed to have been set ablaze. Cries once inhibited erupted forth among the crowd, and irascible sentiments ran rampage. Gradually, the slapping on the gate turned into poundings. Panic and terror pervaded the air. Hysteria abounded all over.

The latent time bomb called “Shen Wei” finally detonated. It was like a sharp sword hanging over Shen Zechuan’s head all the time. Concealed within was Zhongbo’s resistance to Shen Zechuan, which could never be eradicated even if Shen Zechuan obtained the Six Prefectures of Zhongbo. Shen Wei abandoned the city and fled, resulting in a bloodbath in Duanzhou and Dunzhou. And now, Shen Zechuan still had yet to show himself. Once again, the Shen clan had cowered back and fled.

“Open the gate, open the gate...” Someone bawled.

The gate protruded forward slightly, opening up a crack from all those crowding. One of the remaining soldiers on garrison duty, unable to stop the crowd, craned his neck and rebuffed, “Stop jostling!”

But it was to no avail. The crowd had already been thrown into disorder.

The soldier on garrison duty gasped for breath, not daring to open the gate. The scouts in the east were all killed. No one would know even if the Biansha Cavalry took a detour around to the west. If he opened the city gate now, he would be giving Duanzhou a stab in the back. The city would be really breached then!

The soldier on garrison duty shoved the commoners with brute force. Drawing out the blade on his waist, he bellowed, “Who the hell gonna jostle again?!”

Kong Ling instantly said, “Oh no.”

Sure enough, as soon as the soldier of the garrison troops flashed his blade, pandemonium completely broke out all around. Cloth bundles and fists came raining down on him. The tide of people surged forth and yelled, “Open the gate!”

The garrison troops could not really kill the people. Protecting his head as he retreated, the soldier on garrison duty sensed someone seizing his blade and could not help but blurt, "Grab my blade and I'll start slashing!"

The city gate shook from the banging. Before the soldier on garrison duty could stand steady on his feet, a massive force suddenly came assaulting from the back. The entire city gate let loose a muffled "bang" as a battering ram broke the gate from the outside!

"Fuck me!" The soldier on garrison duty lay prone on the ground and got trampled upon a few times. He crawled to his feet and kicked out at the commoners blocking the way, frantically pushing them backward. To his own soldiers, he yelled, "Quick, block the gate!"

"The Biansha Cavalry!" The crowd shrieked in fear. Everyone scrambled backward in an attempt to flee. "The Biansha Cavalry has breached the city!"

Dragging his blade, the soldier on garrison duty pressed his back up against the gate that was on the verge of collapse. He shouted in unison with dozens of other soldiers as they attempted to push the battered gate back into place. But then, the huge wooden battering ram outside struck the gate once more, the impact so forceful it made their backs numb.

Yao Wenyu braced himself against the armrests of his wheelchair. Gao Zhongxiong and Kong Ling stood on each side, wanting to push Yuanzhuo away. Kong Ling's hackles were raised. Through that partially open city gate, he finally heard the long-awaited sound of horses' hooves.

"I'll take Yuanzhuo through the alley." Pushing Yao Wenyu, Kong Ling disregarded the records and picked up the hem of his robe. "Shenwei, run!"

Gao Zhongxiong's hands were trembling badly. "I'll stay with you..."

The city gate was completely destroyed, and wood splinters flew all over. The garrison troops could not hold up against the onslaught of attacks, and the Biansha Cavalry galloped in over their heads and swung their scimitars at Gao Zhongxiong.

The garrison troop soldier lunged and suddenly parried the scimitar. With his back to them, he said, "Run. Report to His Lordship quickly. The west gate is down. Our garrison—"

Before he could finish his words, his head tumbled to the ground.

Gao Zhongxiong involuntarily yelled out. His legs went weak, and he held onto the wheelchair for support, almost falling to the ground. Yao Wenyu saw the scimitar come attacking once again. His back was soaked in sweat. All of a sudden, he turned the wheelchair around to shield Kong Ling and Gao Zhongxiong.

A column of light cavalry passed through the crowd so swiftly they looked like a stream of mercury in the darkness of the night. A longsword that had been hurled forth stabbed into the throat of the Biansha Cavalryman. The light cavalry, meanwhile, had already charged to the front just as the other party toppled off the horse.

Qiao Tianya reined in his horse, pulled out his own sword, and inserted it back into its sheath. He looked at Yao Wenyu as he gasped for breath and shouted to Ding Tao behind him, "Take the gentlemen away!"

Yao Wenyu did not move. He gripped the armrests of his wheelchair tightly. As he turned his head, his eyes looked past Qiao Tianya to see Feng Ta Shuang Yi neighing as it raised its hooves. On its back, Shen Zechuan's white sleeves flipped over. Yang Shan Xue was like an enraged dragon, moving with swift efficiency as it passed through the Biansha Cavalry's throats like a sudden burst of lightning so quick one could barely get a clear look at it.

Feng Ta Shuang Yi passed over heads as it galloped towards the city gate. The Imperial Cavalry behind swept towards the Biansha Cavalry, the impact of their blades upon scimitars sending up a spray of sparks in the frigid wind.

Qiao Tianya made to leave too, but Yao Wenyu looked at him, faint veins bulging on the back of his hands as he whispered to him, "Bring His Lordship back!"

Shen Zechuan was in ill health, and he had ruined his right hand a long time back in Dunzhou. What's more, he was now the master of the six prefectures. If he were to die on the battlefield in a moment of carelessness, then all the painstaking efforts of everyone in Zhongbo would be all for nothing.

Qiao Tianya showed no expression.

Yao Wenyu looked pleadingly at him and enunciated, word for word, "The ruler who commands all doesn't put himself in harm's way."

Shen Zechuan shook off the drops of blood on Yang Shan Xue and reined in his horse in the open space. With his chest heaving, he faced the wind. The two fingers on his right hand throbbed faintly with pain. He stood at the very front, looking at the dusky world. He was not strong, but he would not fall. He was like an obscure grit in the daylight, and also like the shiny steel blade nailed to the ground right before the city of Duanzhou.

He was insidious, cunning, unscrupulous, and even vindictive.

He was not cut out to be an emperor at all.

But—

Qiao Tianya leaned over and feebly flicked the center of Yao Wenyu's forehead. Just as Yao Wenyu thought he would do as told, Qiao Tianya turned his horse around and bellowed, "Unto death we pledge to follow His Lordship in slaying the enemies—!"

Light instantly broke through the horizon, and the vast expanse of darkness dispersed in the blink of an eye. Shen Zechuan's blade slipped past the outer side of his thigh, and the sharp edge of his blade shot straight out in the light.

Like its master, Feng Ta Shuang Yi would only move onward.

Onward!

The Imperial Cavalry sternly shouted in a chorus of voices, "Unto death we pledge to follow His Lordship in slaying the enemies!"

In the eyes of these people, he was the sovereign who heralded the dawn of a new era!

CHAPTER 248: NAMELESS

Warning: Birds Abuse

The Biansha Cavalry that had come to mount a surprise attack at the west gate did not expect there to be such a light cavalry concealed within Duanzhou. This cavalry rode ponies that were similar to theirs, advancing and retreating freely among the dark and gloomy landscape.

Shen Zechuan was a white-feathered bird amidst the flock of crows. The blade he had wiped clean cut through the first glimmer of dawn. Before the second wave of assaults began, he commanded. “Retreat.”

Ding Tao guided the commoners into evacuating. The west gate of the city had already been breached; this place would soon be reduced to a battlefield. Li Xiong hoisted up Gao Zhongxiong and brought Kong Ling and Yao Wenyu with him as he followed behind the commoners.

The Imperial Cavalry stood in order before the gate. They were few in number, but they were presently the absolute elites of Zhongbo. The surviving garrison troops at the west gate, not daring to make an oversight, pushed the mobile gable wall wagon that served as a substitute at the base of the city wall. This kind of movable wall filled with lime mortar was not as thick as the city gate, although the recessed areas allowed for the placement of powerful bows.

The Hongying banner flapped in the wind. The Biansha Cavalry had already started to beat on their drums. Those cylindrical drums were deafening, and the ponies dug in their hooves, poised for action. They did not give the west gate the opportunity to be patched up. Under the beats of the drum, they launched their second round of attack before the Imperial Cavalry did.

The sound of hooves was like a sudden rainstorm that hammered down with such vehemence that the ground shook slightly. Gravel bounced all over, and dust went assaulting them in the faces all at once. The imposing momentum of the Biansha Cavalry came bearing down on them right in the face, so swift they were like starving jackals and leopards.

Qiao Tianya's horse was just right behind Feng Ta Shuang Yi to the side. He pulled the reins tightly and said, "Ready—"

It was as if the Imperial Cavalry had entered a state of meditation. The wind blew across their cheeks, but no sound followed in its wake. Even their breathing seemed to have vanished. Galloping on his pony, the head of Biansha Cavalry closed the distance and pressed in towards Shen Zechuan. Shen Zechuan got a whiff of the strong stench of the Biansha Cavalry's sweat, and even saw the hideous expressions on the Biansha Cavalry's faces.

Time seemed to have stood still.

The next moment, Shen Zechuan flashed his blade and charged. At the same time Feng Ta Shuang Yi bulldozed its way into the ranks of Biansha Cavalry vanguards, he said, "Slay the enemies!"

Slay the enemies!

Like a raging tide of dark clouds, the Imperial Cavalry and the Biansha Cavalry collide fiercely on the passageway of the city gate. Steel blades and scimitars clinked and clanged as they crossed each other. The west gate had no battle tactics to speak of; the only way was to kill the enemies. It was only by thwarting the Biansha Cavalry head-on that Duanzhou's defensive battle could continue. Shen Zechuan had to charge at the very front, using this kind of crude way to rally and unite the people of Duanzhou.

The Biansha Cavalry congested the passageway and blocked out the light. It was here both parties crowded as the sound of combat and killing thundered through the skies. Sprays of splattering blood from all around soaked through Shen Zechuan's sleeves. He brandished his blade and cut down the enemy troops before him. The first light of day penetrating through shone upon his cheeks, which were trickling with blood and sweat. With a malicious and ruthless expression in his eyes, the Prefectural Lord knocked down the Biansha Cavalry with unstoppable momentum and charged right ahead.

This branch of Biansha Cavalry was a sneak attack squad that had circled to the back. They were no match for the Imperial Cavalry – whose morale was at an all-time high – and repeatedly retreated into the passageway. Both times they crossed swords, they suffered badly, and eventually, they had no choice but to withdraw from the passageway. The garrison troops saw their opportunity and acted, pushing the mobile gable wall wagon in unison to block the destroyed city gate when Shen Zechuan retreated.

The wheels made clicking sounds as they rotated, and a garrison troop pushing the wall yelled, “Not enough bows and arrows!”

Shen Zechuan reined in his horse. Yang Shan Xue hung by his side, dripping blood the entire way. He said, “Let down the backup overhanging gate.”

The garrison troops at the top of the city hauled in the rope, and the overhanging gate crashed down to the ground amid the rotating sounds of interlocking gears, blocking off access to the interior of the passageway. This was Duanzhou’s second layer of defensive wall, specifically designed to deal with situations like what was happening now.

Shen Zechuan’s right hand could not hold his blade tight. He only had to stop, and his two fingers would throb with pain. He felt in his sleeve pocket and only found Xiao Chiye’s blue handkerchief. He used it to secure the hilt of Yang Shan Xue to his palm, strapping his two fingers tightly to ensure that the blade would not slip from his hand.

“Pass the word to the north and south city gates now,” Shen Zechuan said. “Lower all the backup overhanging gates.”

Amu’er had the Zhongbo’s military map seven years ago, and he could be said to know Duanzhou and Dunzhou like the back of his palm. Judging from Hasen’s tactics of launching swift surprise attacks and precise points of attacks, he must have also seen Zhongbo’s military map. Since Duanzhou had already become an isolated city, it would be unwise to defend just the east gate alone.

“Lower the backup gates, and we won’t be able to get out anymore.” Qiao Tianya watched the rays of morning light sweep over the city walls. “The smoke signal towers<sup>5</sup> have yet to be lit.”

“There will naturally be people going to light up the smoke signal towers in Dunzhou and Mount Luo.” Shen Zechuan clenched his fist. “The east gate is still open. As long as the smoke signal tower near the Bianjun Commandery is lit up again, the reinforcements from the Bianjun Commandery will arrive.”

Hasen must have used some way to delay Xiao Chiye, but Xiao Chiye would definitely come. That was why Hasen had opted for a swift surprise attack; he wanted a quick battle, so that he could breach Duanzhou first before Xiao Chiye led the reinforcements over and looted the granaries clean before making his escape. He had no wish at all to engage Xiao Chiye head-on in a battle in Zhongbo.

Yin Chang led the garrison troops to kill a bunch of Biansha infantry soldiers before retreating. As long as he could prevent the infantry soldiers from erecting the passage planks, the east gate would not immediately face the brunt of the Biansha Cavalry’s assault.

“Retreat, retreat! Don’t risk your fucking life and go all out; we are going to fight a protracted war with these sons of a bitch.” Yin Chang wiped the blood from his face and kicked out at the backsides of the slow-running garrison troops.

All four gates of Duanzhou had to be defended and secured, and to the 20,000 garrison troops, this was a challenge. Yin Chang wanted to stall for time, so his garrison troops had to be able to withstand the assault of the cavalry. In addition, he had to be able to both hold off the infantry and preserve his physical strength before the Biansha Cavalry charged.

The garrison troops retreated into the city. Yin Chang was the last batch. He was all prepared to cross the trench when he heard the sound of horse hooves behind him. He promptly broke out in a cold sweat. Relying on the foresight of a seasoned war veteran, the old man rolled on the ground and yelled, “Draw your blades!”

That crescent-like scimitar went slashing through the position where Yin Chang’s head had been earlier.

His heart palpitating, the old man rubbed his neck and shouted at the new arrival, “How can you not even say hello!”

Zhuoli could not understand Yin Chang’s words. His powerful hooves had already stomped its way in front of Yin Chang. Yin Chang rolled over, covering himself in dust all over.

Zhuoli happily said, “What a nimble prey.”

Yin Chang did not understand what Zhuoli was saying either. He braced himself on the ground with one hand and grasped the blade backhandedly with the other hand as he faced off against Zhuoli in a bizarre confrontation beside the trench.

Savage.

Yin Chang wiped his red nose with his thumb that reeked of the earth and made his assessment of Zhuoli. The expression in his eyes was as silent as this expanse of sky. Those din from the artillery bombardment could not sway him. He was one with the mother earth, completely poles apart from the raucous image his appearance portrayed. He always had with him an unparalleled composure in times of crisis.

“You,” Yin Chang’s dropping voice was slightly hoarse as the old man said with certainty, “have been to Cizhou seven years ago.”

On hearing “Cizhou”, Zhuoli gestured to Yin Chang with his scimitar and said in broken Dazhou language, “I, been there. With, this blade.”

The strong wind tousled up Yin Chang’s white hair. The old man kicked out against the ground with legs and sprang up high. He swung his blade towards Zhuoli’s head. Zhuoli held up his scimitar to block the blow, and the battle pony under him took several steps back from the impact of Yin Chang’s force.

Perceptive, Zhuoli asked, “You, recognize me?”

Both of Yin Chang’s palms trembled slightly when he landed on the ground. He slid his feet apart and suddenly burst out laughing. “I recognize you, but you don’t recognize me. Seven years ago in Cizhou, I watched you people burn down the houses and slaughtered the entire city...” His expression abruptly turned cold and still.

“You took away their heads.”

Zhuoli half-listened and half-guessed. He waited until Yin Chang was done speaking before he undid the hemp rope at the side of his thigh, where the heads of the Chashi River scouts were hanging. He lifted them up and threw them to Yin Chang, then said in the Biansha tongue, “I don’t want them anymore. I want your head.”

The heads rolled at Yin Chang’s feet. They were all young faces. Yin Chang looked at these faces, then at Zhuoli.

He watched Zhuoli quietly.

Yet Zhuoli felt that the ferocious beast in this old body was roaring.

“You should accord dignity to those who died in battle,” Yin Chang said. “You beasts.”

Fei Sheng followed the garrison troops to disperse the commoners. He stood on the street and hesitated for a moment, then turned around and ran back to the east gate. Midway through, he heard the sound of hooves, and Fei Sheng looked back to see Shen Zechuan leading the Imperial Cavalry towards the east gate.

“Get on the horse!” Qiao Tianya threw the horsewhip hanging at the side to Fei Sheng.

Fei Sheng caught the whip and slowed his pace. When an unoccupied horse galloped past him, he flipped onto it. Grabbing on the reins, he asked Qiao Tianya, “How’s the west gate?”

“Destroyed.”

The color drained from Fei Sheng’s face.

Qiao Tianya continued, “And His Lordship walled it up again.”

Fei Sheng couldn’t help but curse, “Can’t you fucking finish your sentence in one go?!”

Qiao Tianya burst into laughter. Both of them followed Shen Zechuan and continued to gallop eastward. When they reached the city gate, they saw the gate wide open. The garrison troops had yet to completely withdraw.

Shen Zechuan dismounted and took long strides to the top of the city. Midway through, the intensive bombardment stopped him in his tracks. He brushed away the floating dust and asked, “Do we still have the parapets?”

“Not for long.” Covering his ears, Fei Sheng shouted, “The Biansha Cavalry switched to single-branch cannons!”<sup>6</sup>

Shen Zechuan’s heart sank slightly. Hasen meant to smash down the eastern defense wall of Duanzhou with continuous bombardment. He looked down along the battlements and saw that the Biansha Cavalry had already forced their way to within a short distance from the trench.

“Open the sluice gates and release the water.” Shen Zechuan’s expression was heavy. “The Biansha Cavalry is going to charge.”

“Open the sluice gates—” Fei Sheng dashed towards the south. Midway through shouting, he choked on the dust. Covering his mouth and nose, he instantly recalled something. Grabbing a garrison troop soldier at the side, he asked, “Why isn’t the city gate closed yet? The Biansha Cavalry is about to attack!”

The garrison troop soldier answered as he coughed, “The commander, the commander has not withdrawn yet!”

Startled, Fei Sheng disregarded the heavy rocks flying all around and held on to the city wall as he looked down. There were too many soldiers and horses in a jumble down there, and he strained to find Yin Chang among them.

“Come on, man, return to the city...”

Yin Chang’s blade hooked onto Zhuoli’s scimitar, both of them engaged in a back-and-forth battle on the ground. The old man’s feet slid. He bellowed and moved backward, his peripheral vision capturing the sight of the oncoming cavalry.

He couldn’t fight a protracted war!

Yin Chang immediately relaxed his strength, and the blade dropped down along the gap of the scimitar. He reached out an arm to grab the hilt and broke into a run towards the trench. The water storage sluice gates on both sides of the city walls had yet to be opened; they were waiting for the garrison troops to return to the city before releasing them. But Yin Chang felt scalding heat behind his back while he was dashing like mad, and as he rolled forward, he shouted, “SHUT THE GATE—!”

The oncoming Biansha Cavalry behind did not come to storm the city at all. Taking advantage of the fact that the city gate had yet to be closed, they tipped out the tits with their tails lit from their bags. These birds panicky rushed around blindly, their bags already in flames. Then they swarmed across the trench and went crashing towards the city gate.

The overhanging gate within the passageway of the city gate was made of wood. Once it started burning, the defense of the east gate would be lost.

Yin Chang stopped before the trench and sprang up without warning, but behind him, Zhuoli followed suit and lunged over to snag Yin Chang’s robe. Under the sound of ripping, he dragged Yin Chang to the ground.

Yin Chang thrust his blade onto the ground to steady his body, which was being pulled along by the pony. He shouted himself hoarse at the city gate, “Shut the gate! Release the waters!”

“Fuck, fuck!” Fei Sheng braced himself with his arms and leaped down the stairs, pushing through the crowd as he ran towards the passageway. “Wait. Fuck your ancestors!”

The flaming birds struck against the city gates. The clothes of the garrison troops were already on fire. The men rolled on the ground to put out the fire and ran into the passageway. The base of the inner city wall all had water pouches on standby to extinguish fires, but there were too many birds on fire. If they did not shut the gate now, the overhanging gate would be set aflame too!

Shen Zechuan's throat was dry and hoarse under the persisting bombardment. The sunrise in the east stung his eyes as he stood amidst the dust and gave the order. "Shut the gate."

The city gate moved with a muffled noise. Fei Sheng was still jostling among the crowd of people who were surging back. He was like duckweed<sup>7</sup> going against the currents, with nary a lifesaving straw for him to grasp on to for support. The light within the passageway began to fade. The garrison troops crowding their way in blocked Fei Sheng's view. He could not see outside, much less across the trench.

"Don't shut the gate..." Fei Sheng desperately pushed aside the garrison troops and said the fastest he had ever spoken, "Don't shut it!"

The city gate slammed shut, and the passageway went completely dark. The sluice gates on both sides suddenly lifted, and the unfinished trench held in the water with some difficulty, drawing a boundary line between the city gate and the Biansha Cavalry.

Shen Zechuan abruptly raised his voice. "Put out the fire!"

Unable to hold up against the force, Yin Chang was dragged backward by the battle pony. He dragged his blade, scuffing against the ground. Under the sound of hooves, he ripped off the wine bag at the side of his waist, opened it with his teeth, and poured the wine all over his face. Then he tossed away the wine bag and wiped his face. With his face to the sky, he laughed, "Whoa, it's On Horseback!"

Fei Sheng fell to his knees before the city gate. Clawing at the gap with both hands, he said through gritted teeth, "Open the gate—!"

Shen Zechuan pursed his lips tightly and watched Yin Chang, his eyes both reddened.

Fei Sheng's hands had both gone bloody from clawing at the iron-sheet-covered crack. He pounded on the gate and slammed himself against it. "Open the gate. I'm telling you to OPEN THE GATE!"

Zhuoli lassoed his horsewhip around Yin Chang's neck and hauled the old man up with the strength of his arms. Yin Chang was still gripping his blade. He could not tread steadily on the ground from the stranglehold. He looked at Zhuoli, choking as he said, "Make, make it swift!"

Zhuoli held his scimitar against Yin Chang's neck. He scythed it forward, but Yin Chang unexpectedly lunged forward. The old man took advantage of Zhuoli's raised arm and abandoned his attempts to paw at the whip around his neck. The cutting glint of the steel blade he was backhandedly gripping flashed suddenly as he practically twisted around half of his body, using his forearm to bring over the sharp edge of the blade as he roared. Before Zhuoli got to scythe off his head, he slashed off Zhuoli's head.

Yin Chang fell to the ground, the horsewhip still tightly secured around his neck. He let out a ragged breath, then, propping himself up on the ground with his elbows, he crawled a little in the direction of Duanzhou. Armored hooves thundered behind him like an incoming tidal wave.

Nameless nobody.

Yin Chang laughed out loud.

And started crying.

Xiaosheng.

Taking sharp, urgent gasps for breath, Yin Chang shouted at the city gate, his voice reverberating through the skies. "Your Lordship, seems to me today is—a resounding victory!"

Thundering hooves engulfed the old man whole.

After a brief moment of dead silence on the other end of the city gate, Fei Sheng pounded on the iron sheet as he slid down along that tiny ray of light to the ground, where, with both hands against the gate, he began to bawl.

Author's Notes:

I fabricated the mobile gable wall wagon. Perhaps there indeed was such a defensive weapon with such a function, but I didn't see a definite name when I was doing my research, so I made up one here. (And Lianyin made up the English term ._.)

Thank you for reading.

CHAPTER 249: WARFARE TACTIC

The flaming birds barging all over were shut outside the gate. Meanwhile, the garrison troops did not stop. They darted about in the passageway, dragging the reserve water bags to pour the water over the city gate as a precaution.

The Biansha Cavalry across the trench was infuriated and exasperated as they faced Zhuoli's corpse. Zhuoli was a Lizard who followed Amu'er deep into Zhongbo seven years ago, and he was a gift Amu'er gave to Hasen. It was precisely because of him that Hasen could sever Duanzhou's external connections in just a few short days.

"Drag him away!" A Biansha cavalryman looked at the Duanzhou gate. "This reckless, stupid good-for-nothing... Buck up! Before Hasen arrives, we must think of a way to cross over this trench!"

Yin Chang removed the passage planks and even killed the infantry pushing the head cart, subsequently plunging the Biansha Cavalry into a brief period of anxiety as they faced the trench. At the same time, he also gave the garrison troops within the city the chance to catch their breath. But then, the trench of Duanzhou was still not considered a moat. In order to connect the trench on both the north and south sides, the square bricks on both ends had not been solidly embedded, so this trench could not be kept filled for a long period of time. The water storage sluice gates had been opened, and the water had been emptied out. Even if the trench could hold out, the Biansha Cavalry would soon think of a way to cross it.

Before dark, the Biansha Cavalry would definitely storm the east gate.

“Prepare the heavy rocks,” Shen Zechuan turned his head to the side to say to Qiao Tianya. “Push the mounted crossbow up the city wall!”

The garrison troops at the foot of the city worked as one and exerted themselves to push the mounted crossbow up along the wider passageway. The Biansha Cavalry’s single-branch cannons<sup>8</sup> kept up with their onslaught of assaults, and the heavy rocks hurled at the city wall had already smashed out an opening in the city wall facing east. Broken pieces of bricks fell off along with pieces of clay and mud. In addition, a few of the battlements had collapsed too. The garrison troops had no choice but to cover their heads with their arms and dodge the debris as they pressed their bodies against the mounted crossbow that was sliding downward.

The garrison troops were unable to hold up against the force of gravity, and the mounted crossbow weighed down on them until their heels scraped against the ground as they slid down too. All they could do was to shout, “It’s too heavy!”

Qiao Tianya leaped over the stairs, intending to lend a helping hand, but he saw a commoner in cotton clothes lower his body slightly and raise both arms to hold up the part of the mounted crossbow that was sliding down.

Ji Gang, with dust on his white hair, bellowed in a deep voice, “Lift —!”

The garrison troops felt the weight on their backs lighten. Bulging veins on Ji Gang’s temple jumped slightly. He strode forward a step at a time, slowly shifting the mounted crossbow up along the slope. By the time the mounted crossbow was in position, both of Ji Gang’s arms were trembling, and his back, too, was all drenched in sweat.

It was now the hour of si, when the sun shone bright. Soldiers ran everywhere, their faces smeared with a blend of sweat and dust that made them choke. They did not dare to recklessly fire the arrows on the battlements, as the enemy troops might sway them into depleting their inventory. They had to save it until the Biansha Cavalry charged before firing the arrows. The same went for the mounted crossbow too. This killing weapon could not be activated too rashly. It had to be lethal in one blow and hurt the Biansha Cavalry, just like how Yin Chang killed Zhuoli.

“Split up the garrison troops into three squads to defend the three gates. Have the Imperial Cavalry await their orders at the east gate.” Shen Zechuan raised the hand gripping his blade and used the back of his hand to wipe the sweat on his cheek. "We have to seal off the remaining three gates before night falls."

Duanzhou's granaries were in full abundance. To attack Duanzhou, the Biansha Cavalry could lay a long siege to deplete the granaries in Duanzhou. Trap and strand Duanzhou for a month, and wear down Duanzhou to death. But Hasen wanted a quick battle, so he would not adopt the strategy of laying a long-term siege. The Biansha Cavalry had been mounting a violent onslaught of attack since last night. If they were to come to a deadlock at the east gate, then the Biansha Cavalry would very likely circle around to the other three gates and advance from the side, just like how they launched a sneak attack on the west gate.

Shen Zechuan had lowered the overhanging gate at the other three gates as a defense, but this was not a long-term solution, as the Biansha Cavalry had siege weapons. The battering rams equipped with thick, sturdy woods could directly break down the city gates, followed by the overhanging gates to let the Biansha Cavalry enter the city unobstructed.

"Kerosene. Rocks," Shen Zechuan said. "Then tear down the collapsed watchtower in the city and have garrison troops separately defending the three gates bring whatever they can use for resistance to the top of the city. As long as you catch sight of the Biansha Cavalry, blow the horn to sound the signal and throw down the miscellaneous objects to stop them from charging."

He had to think of a way to get out of the city again as soon as possible.

Shen Zechuan looked at the horizon in the southeast.

The smoke signal tower there was still and silent.

All the gentlemen were gathered at the riding stables. This place, being wide and spacious, could accommodate several groups of commoners from the city. Gao Zhongxiong had only just regained his composure. He leaned over to rub at his calves as he said to Kong Ling, "Just, just now, that situation..."

The moment he got anxious, he started to stammer again.

Kong Ling soothed him. "No harm done. Your courage in wanting to bring Yuanzhuo away with you at that time is already deserving of praise. Back then in my younger days in Dunzhou when I learned that the cavalry had entered the city, I really couldn't care about anything else at all."

Yao Wenyu was clutching at his sleeves when a hand interrupted his train of thought in the silence. He glanced over and saw that the woman from earlier was calling her child over to return the handkerchief. Yao Wenyu raised his hand but did not take the handkerchief. Instead, he extended his dust-tainted fingers and gently touched the child's cheek.

Alive.

Yao Wenyu's chest heaved slightly.

The sound of footsteps along the riding stables intensified as the garrison troops sprinted past and made to get to the top of the wall.

"Supply the bow and arrows to the west gate!" The junior general in the lead sheathed his blade and moved the miscellaneous objects with his bare hands. "Leave the collapsed watchtower to us!"

"Not enough," the soldier at the top of the wall answered. "Just one tower collapsed. It's not enough!"

Duanzhou had quite a number of defensive weapons. The armory had all been emptied, mainly to support the east gate. The remaining gates could only pick from what was left to share between them. A wave of their bows and arrows had been depleted by Biansha Cavalry in the morning, and now they had to make up for the shortfall over at the west gate where the entrance had been blocked up with the mobile gable wall wagons.

What were they to do?

A man suddenly stood up from the riding stables. Weighing up an old hoe, he asked, "Can this be thrown?"

The junior general said, "Throw it away, and it won't be returned to you!"

"Then you take it." The man tried his best to speak in officialese. "The city is besieged. No point in keeping this hoe if we can't beat the Biansha Cavalry to death. Are you short of men?"

The garrison troops did not answer, considering that they had just clashed with the commoners earlier at the west gate.

Many a number of people then stood up from the riding stables. They were all men in the prime of their lives, carrying with them their own farming tools. They shouted at the garrison troops. "Are you short of men? If so, we are all men here!"

The Biansha Cavalry's artillery assault persisted until the hour of you when dusk fell. The east gate was patched up over and over again, and the spare parapet walls were all about to be smashed down to nothing. Yet, the Biansha Cavalry did not show any intention of stopping. This was the real artillery bombardment—they would never stop until the collapse of the eastern side of the city wall.

“The single-branch cannons are all rocks.” Crouching behind the battlement, Qiao Tianya said to Shen Zechuan against the sounds of the cannon. “They are out there in the open fields, so they have no lack of rocks. If this keeps on for two more days, then even if the Biansha Cavalry doesn’t charge through the trench, the city wall would not be able to hold up any further.”

“Hasen can’t wait two days.” Shen Zechuan’s cheeks were filthy. “The Biansha Cavalry will definitely attack before nightfall.”

Now that the garrison troops had lost Yin Chang, the Biansha Cavalry had to probe just how far over their heads the garrison troops were at present. Having endured a day of bombardment, the garrison troops were already very exhausted, and this was presently an excellent opportunity for the Biansha Cavalry.

“When they cross the trench, we’ll open the city gate,” Shen Zechuan said. “The garrison troops will continue to defend the city. Let the Imperial Cavalry fend off the attack.”

“Fei Sheng and I...”

“You and I.” Shen Zechuan raised his eyes. “You’ll alternate with me. As long as you beat back the Biansha Cavalry’s charge, retreat into the city immediately. Don’t persist in fighting.”

The number of Biansha Cavalry far exceeded that of the Imperial Cavalry. A steel needle could not face up against a broad ax head-on. Shen Zechuan only had to pierce through the Biansha Cavalry’s momentum, and he would be able to maintain a defensive posture.

Qiao Tianya licked his lips and said with a stern countenance. “You’re the Prefectural Lord, not a general.”

Shen Zechuan did not answer. Bracing himself against the wall, he stood up. Under the dim filament of heaven, he looked past the dense cluster of Biansha Cavalry at the Chashi River. The Chashi River was like a jade belt<sup>9</sup> dipping in the sunset, reflecting the thick, magnificent clouds where the saker falcons soared among.

The expression in Shen Zechuan’s eyes gradually took on an edge of sharpness.

“I’m the Prefectural Lord of Zhongbo,” he said.

Before the magnificent clouds above the Chashi River had dispersed, the wall beside Shen Zechuan’s hand quaked with a thunderous crash.

“The catapults!” The garrison troop on the lookout at the watchtower sounded the alarm at the top of his voice. “Here comes the Biansha Cavalry’s catapults!”

After a full day’s rest, the catapults that had sounded off the prelude to the battle last night were now back in the game following the single-branch cannons. The Biansha Cavalry started to split up into squads, pounding on their cylindrical drums to swiftly pass on information on the battlefield.

Shen Zechuan promptly yanked off his cumbersome wide robe, secured that singular arm guard tightly, and descended the steps to the base of the city wall where Feng Ta Shuang Yi was waiting with its chin up. He got onto his horse and said to Qiao Tianya, “Stay vigilant at the remaining three gates.”

Qiao Tianya bowed, then shouted. “Your Lordship, to a resounding victory!”

Shen Zechuan tugged at the reins and turned the horse around, steering it towards the passageway. His ravishing appearance was covered with blood and sweat; only his eyes remained bright. Behind him, the Imperial Cavalry steadied their breathing—they too wanted to end this battle quickly.

The war steed at a side abruptly sunk slightly as Fei Sheng got on and shifted the Xiuchun blade at the side of his waist before him. His bloodshot eyes looked at Shen Zechuan. “I am Your Lordship’s guard.” He paused for a moment, then drew his blade and raised his voice. “We are Your Lordship’s shields!”

Shen Zechuan nodded slightly, and Feng Ta Shuang Yi started to trod forward. His figure gradually stepped into the passageway. In the moment of silence as he faced the city gate, Shen Zechuan proclaimed. “I live and die with all of you.”

The city gates opened once again. That dull thud ushered in the last of the daylight that weaved in and out of the countless horse hooves.

All at once, the Hongying banner was raised high in the evening glow. A cavalryman hoisted up the flagpole, and from where he was behind the reorganized infantry, waved it suddenly and shouted in the Biansha tongue, “Charge—!”

The stray wisp of Fei Sheng's hair swayed in the wind. His badly scraped fingers gripped onto the hilt of the blade tightly, and in the instant Shen Zechuan spurred his horse on forward, he shouted. "A resounding victory!"

Feng Ta Shuang Yi trod on the dust and galloped forth.

The infantry abandoned their shields and kneeled orderly with the passage planks in their arms. As the Biansha Cavalry was about to cross over them, they started erecting a narrow bridge. Stepping across the planks, the men with scimitars crossed the trench and came head to head with the Imperial Cavalry at the foot of the city.

After a full day's rest outside the city, the Biansha Cavalry was brimming with energy. They drank their fill of milk tea and ate their fill of dried meat jerky. At first, they thought they would face up against an already exhausted garrison troop, but who knew that the Imperial Cavalry was also sufficiently rested and had also stuffed themselves full with dry rations. There was no opportunity at all for the Biansha Cavalry to take advantage of.

Amidst the disarray of hooves, both parties collided with brute force, like blade striking against blade.

All along, Yang Shan Xue had never met force with force with the scimitars, for Shen Zechuan artfully went straight for the throats. His arm guard became heavy, and blood that trickled in slid further down along his arm, staining half of his body red.

The number of men for the Biansha Cavalry's first charge was not enough, and the passage bridge that had been hastily erected was too narrow and could not hold up against the Imperial Cavalry's combat at close quarters. So the Biansha Cavalry could only retreat temporarily and hastily end this round of attack.

Shen Zechuan immediately turned his horse around and returned to the city. The city gate shut again when he entered the passageway. Torches were lit up in the passageway. The hour of hai was somehow already fast approaching.

Shen Zechuan's right arm was slow to react. When he was still in the Imperial Bodyguards, he had never fought with all his might for such a long period of time. Then he had neglected his martial arts practice after arriving in Zhongbo. He was already now aware of how slow-reacting his body was.

No sensation in both fingers.

Shen Zechuan lifted his left hand to wipe away the blood on his face without so much an expression, then swapped positions with Qiao Tianya.

The Imperial Bodyguards had not even rested for two hours when the drums outside sounded again, and the Biansha Cavalry attacked for the second time. This time, Qiao Tianya led the troops to resist and fight back, and it was not until the hour of chou that he returned.

“The warfare tactic of taking turns to fight and wear the opponent down.”<sup>10</sup> Fei Sheng watched from the battlements as the Biansha Cavalry moved their torches around. “Their cavalry is different every round of attack, so the fight won’t stop even if the fight goes on until daybreak.”

“Hasen stashed away a portion of his troops.” Shen Zechuan leaned against the wall for a rest and stuffed several mouthfuls of steamed buns into his mouth. “Otherwise, there won’t be complete silence from Ce’an.”

Before Xiao Chiye headed down south, he had done a simulation with Lu Guangbai. The purpose of his trip down south was to lure Hasen into mobilizing his troops, but the warning sign to this was that the Biansha Cavalry at the entrance of the battle zone would be reduced. Lu Guangbai still had yet to come to provide reinforcement, and that meant that the onslaught of assaults at the battle zone had not stopped. Hasen had long put enough camouflages in place in order to attack Duanzhou. It was very likely that there were more than the six tribes behind Amu’er.

Gazing at the cavalry, Fei Sheng said, “I have to bring the old man back.”

Shen Zechuan managed with some effort to finish his steamed bun and stood up with Yang Shan Xue in hand. He had already gone without sleep for a day and a night.

“We have to think of a way to do so...” Shen Zechuan raised his head slightly. “Qiao Tianya need not retreat during the next round of attack. We’ll head out of the city together.”

Fei Sheng looked back.

The expression in Shen Zechuan’s eyes was somber as he said with clear enunciation, “Fuck.”

Fei Sheng’s stiff facial muscles gradually began to move. He did not know why either, but he suddenly broke into laughter. He laughed and laughed, and in the midst of laughing, he raised a hand to wipe his tears as he followed suit and said, “Fuck.”

CHAPTER 250: DEFENSIVE BATTLE

Warning: Violence

Three quarters past the hour of chou, gloomy clouds concealed the moon.

The Biansha Cavalry withdrew from the front lines after they regrouped, replaced by the elite forces from the first attack. The torches they raised suddenly went out, and the drums that had been sounding all night stopped. The outskirts of Duanzhou were abruptly plunged into darkness. Without the illumination of the torches, the archers along the city wall could not see across the trench clearly. The sentry climbed up the only remaining watchtower and bravely stepped on the railing, where he craned his neck to survey from high above the ground.

“Can’t get a clear look.” The sentry’s temples dripped with sweat as he gestured to the top of the wall. “Too dark!”

The onslaught of attacks from the single-branch cannon and catapults ceased too. Other than a scattering of sound from hooves, no other news could be gathered from within the city. In this rare moment of silence, the garrison troops trod lightly, as if afraid of startling something. They stood up in their respective positions, with some premonition of the rainstorm that was about to come assaulting.

The garrison troops in the passageway began to withdraw outward, dragging the corpses they had cleared out to make way for the Imperial Cavalry. Clear water splashed over the green slab stones and flushed past the hooves of the horses, dissipating the strong, heavy stench of blood.

The ranks of the Biansha Cavalry moved. They planned to pass through the passage planks they had securely erected, then form a wall before the city gate. They had figured out the ways of the Imperial Cavalry after numerous attempts at feeling them out. To deal with the steel needle, they had to form a thick brick to smash it to pieces!

The garrison troops stationed at the top of the city wall did not dare to wipe their sweat. Their Adam's apples bobbed as they listened to the sound of hooves and silently counted down in unison in their hearts.

The Biansha Cavalry dashed towards the trench.

The hooves of the Biansha Cavalry's ponies stepped onto the passage planks, and the thunderous sound instantaneously resounded through the trench.

Now!

The garrison troops waved their banners and shouted in a hoarse voice, "Shove—!"

The heavy rocks at the top of the city wall started rolling along the small wooden passages, rumbling as they turned past a few small and short areas, where they bumped against the edges and went springing out to rain upon the trench. The Biansha Cavalry, who had been hidden in the darkness, could not block the sudden assault from above, and they were knocked off stride by the smashing rocks. More than half of the passage planks immediately broke apart, and countless Biansha Cavalrymen plunged into the trench.

The city gate was already wide open. With Shen Zechuan in the center and Qiao Tianya and Fei Sheng as the flanks, the three squads charged in unison. The Biansha Cavalry's formation that had fallen to pieces left countless voids, and the Imperial Cavalry attacked where they saw openings, tearing the Biansha Cavalry's attacking squads into pieces starting from the trench.

Archers replaced the rock pushers at the top of the city wall. Hot oil was poured over the arrowheads, which were wrapped in tattered rags. The arrows were then fired down at the same time they were ignited. The Biansha Cavalry did not have the cover of the infantry's head cart, nor did they have the protection of armors, so the moment the flaming arrows brushed past their clothing, they would start burning.

All at once, the entire trench lit up.

Fei Sheng's right flank had already charged across the trench through the Biansha's passage planks. He bent half of his body over in the strong gale and lashed out with his horsewhip to speed ahead. As he passed by Yin Chang's position, he suddenly slid over to pull out the old man's blade with one arm. The instant he grabbed hold of the hilt of Yin Chang's blade, he turned his head aside to wipe his cheek hard on his shoulder and thrust the blade into the vacated sheath on his back.

In the wind, Fei Sheng pulled the reins to turn the horse aside and continued to gallop towards the smoke signal tower in the southeast.

The Biansha Cavalry sensed a branch of light cavalry breaking out of the encirclement in the dimness. Before the cavalymen they mobilized could close up the opening, Shen Zechuan, who had similarly crossed the trench, clutched them by the throat and forcibly dragged them over. The center and left flank of the Imperial Cavalry were all meant to act as a shield and cover. With their backs to the burning trench, they spared no effort to fight at close quarters under the rain of arrows.

The scattered Biansha Cavalry speedily regrouped themselves, but the speed of the Imperial Cavalry was swift too. None of them held an advantage over the other on their mounts; it all hinged on whose blades were faster.

Qiao Tianya's original appearance was barely discernible under the splatter of blood. He wiped his blade with his sleeve and whistled as he followed Shen Zechuan.

"Your Lordship." Qiao Tianya was done wiping his blade. "Is this blade still good to use?"<sup>11</sup>

In the darkness of the night, where bursts of sparks erupted all over, Shen Zechuan said, "Just as fast as Yang Shan Xue."

Qiao Tianya's tattered sleeves exposed his arm. He had not even put on his arm guard. He was just like a blade without a sheath. All of a sudden, he turned around and said in a way which no one could tell if he was being serious, "Don't say it like that to Yuanzhuo. It's a big misunderstanding. I'm not fast."

"Then I'm really," Shen Zechuan suddenly held up Yang Shan Xue that he had been grasping in a reverse grip at an angle to block the scimitar behind for Qiao Tianya. Blood splashed all over Qiao Tianya's face under the slashing sound of a blade. Calmly, Shen Zechuan continued, "...so very happy for Yuanzhuo."

The Imperial Cavalry in the back returned to their position, and Shen Zechuan ceased to speak. With Yang Shan Xue in tow, he turned the horse around to face the direction of the Biansha Cavalry's single-branch cannon, then broke into a run.

The man in charge of passing on military intelligence sped through the ranks while waving a small flag. Pointing at the single-branch cannon, he said, "Withdraw the cannon!"

But the Imperial Cavalry was too fast. The Scorpion guarding by the side of the single-branch cannon swung his hammer at Shen Zechuan. Just as Shen Zechuan, who was regaining his grip on Yang Shan Xue, was about to cross swords with the Scorpion, he suddenly rolled off his horse, and Feng Ta Shuang Yi instantly lifted its hooves to sidestep away. The Scorpion's intention to break Feng Ta Shuang Yi's legs with a swing of his hammer fell short, and as he turned around, he cursed in the Biansha Tongue, "Cunning—"

Shen Zechuan kicked out at the ground and leaped forth in a pounce. The Scorpion was strapping tall and sturdy, and Shen Zechuan climbed onto the back of the Scorpion's shoulders and used a hand to suddenly crank the head of the Scorpion askew to expose his neck. As the blade met flesh, Yang Shan Xue slashed across it.

His right hand lacked strength, and he unexpectedly missed, failing to slit the Scorpion's throat.

Blood spurted out from the Scorpion's neck. The hammer he was brandishing did not stop. He let loose a ragged gasp that did not sound human and grabbed hold of Shen Zechuan with his free hand.

A drop of blood on the ridge of Shen Zechuan's brow trickled down. He resisted the force, and that blade that had once slashed across the Scorpion's neck made another attempt. As if he was slaughtering cattle and sheep, he used a sawing motion to completely sever the other man's throat.

This relentlessness to persist until the other man's death sent a chill down the backs of the Imperial Cavalry behind him.

The Scorpion toppled over to the ground with a crash. His hammer and Shen Zechuan both went falling.

Feng Ta Shuang Yi had already circled back. Shen Zechuan climbed to his feet and mounted his horse once again. With the tip of his toe, Qiao Tianya lifted the hammer and weighed it in his hand, then swung it down hard on one of the legs of the single-branch cannon stand. The leg of the stand promptly splintered and broke, and the entire single-branch cannon tilted over to the side.

The sound of wood splitting erupted in their ears. Fire instantly started to burn.

Fei Sheng was holding a torch. The right flank had already charged their way close to the smoke signal tower. Exhaling puffs of air as he dismounted, he stumbled and used the other arm to grab to the edge of the steps and scrambled up the tower with both hands and legs.

The Biansha Cavalry, who were in pursuit of them, shouted as they came attacking. Once again, the Imperial Cavalry crossed swords with them at the foot of the tower.

Fei Sheng sprinted along the steps, and when he reached the tower where smoke was to be lit, he tossed the torch in. The dry tower pit burst into flames. He took two steps back and said, "It's done..."

Following that, the garrison troops on top of the city wall cried out loud and shouted below, "It's lit!"

Feng Ta Shuang Yi retreated, and Shen Zechuan said, "Withdraw!"

The flames at the smoke signal tower blazed. Just a few more moments, and the smoke signal towers to the east would all start lighting up in successive order. Fei Sheng held his hand to his chest, wanting to wipe his eyes. But unexpectedly, the sudden wind sent the ashes fluttering all over. The sky that had been overcast for half a night began to act up, with a few drops of rain serving as a forewarning. Before the cheers in Duanzhou could even get going, the torrential rain came pouring down like cold water all over Fei Sheng's face.

It was raining.

The flames of the smoke signal tower were just like delicate flowers swaying in the rainstorm, their heads bowed low from the pounding of the water droplets. Gradually, the fire became smaller.

Fei Sheng lunged to the front of the tower. Blocking out the rain with his hands, he raged. "Bloody heaven!"

No doubt Duanzhou was bound to usher in a bout of rainstorm after several days of clear skies. This rain poured down in torrents, which meant that the trench at the east gate would not lack water for the time being, but it would be tough to light up the smoke signal tower again.

"Come on... light up... Fuck your ancestors!" Fei Sheng struck the flint. However, this rain that had come out of the blue was pouring too hard, and his hands were both soaking wet.

He could not light it up anymore.

This was a sudden rainstorm that came without warning, but it stopped fast too. As long as they could temporarily retreat back to the city, they would still have the opportunity.

Shen Zechuan steeled himself and brandished his blade towards the southeast. "Withdraw!"

Fei Sheng's vision blurred. He thought it was because of the heavy rain. He frantically struck at the flint and watched as the spark spluttered.

Old man.

Fei Sheng's fingernails that he had badly scraped while clawing at the gate were bloodstained. His hands trembled as he raked out the hay that had yet to be extinguished in the tower pit.

It's too hard to be a hero.

Fei Sheng widened his reddened eyes and pulled out the book he had used for information-gathering from his bosom and stuffed it into the pit. He leaned over and blew with his mouth, the smoke choking him to the point he almost suffocated.

In all my life—

Fei Sheng blew on the small fire to let the tongue of the flame lick the book. The fire suddenly flared and almost singed Fei Sheng's hair. He fell to the ground and spat.

—This is the only time I've ever sacrificed myself for others!

The twice-lit smoke signal tower did not blaze high in this downpour, but it was enough. Following the one tiny spark in the southeast that shone faintly, countless flames lit up in succession. They spread abruptly along the smoke signal towers into the shape of a long, snaking dragon that flickered in the heavy rain.

Fei Sheng took a few steps to the front of the tower and prepared to jump down. The voice he wanted to shout out stalled in his throat, and he stepped back again.

The flood of the Biansha Cavalry before the smoke signal tower was so overwhelming that there was no opening to be found at all. The right flank of the Imperial Cavalry was just as slender as an awn of wheat in this sort of large, retracting squad.

Fei Sheng was drenched through. He looked over his Xiuchun Blade that was already chipped from all the hacking, and said to the rain, "I told you a long time ago that a hero doesn't come to a good end."

The rain pounded on Fei Sheng, the cacophony of noises sounding like it was engaging in a war of words with him.

The blood on Fei Sheng's face had been washed away. He tossed away his Xiuchun Blade. Stepping on the edge of the smoke signal tower, he abruptly pulled out Yin Chang's blade. Towards Duanzhou, he shouted, "Your Lordship!" His chest heaved. "Erect a stone tablet for me. Engrave 'Loyal and Courageous, Old Fei the Tenth'. I want to face the Chashi River with the old man and stand guard over Duanzhou for you for ten thousand years!"

Shen Zechuan spurred his horse on. Rainwater splashed across his facial features.

Duanzhou.

Zhongbo.

He was no longer the frigid wind coursing through the territories.<sup>12</sup> There were countless figures behind him. That heavy weight lay upon his shoulders, pinning down a Shen Zechuan who once drifted in the world back onto the ground. As he stepped onto this expanse of land, he couldn't

---

The Prefectural Lord lifted his head high under the torrential rain and roared, "Break out of the encirclement!"

Fei Sheng leaped off the smoke signal tower, rolled to the ground, and flipped over to his feet. Wielding his blade, he hacked off the front knees of the ponies and barged his way in along with the muddy water. The Biansha Cavalry swarmed over like a colony of ants, breaking up the right flank with its charge.

The glint of Yang Shan Xue broke through the rain. Hooves trampled over corpses to break out of the encirclement from the southeast direction.

Fei Sheng held his blade up against a scimitar and was pushed backward. At the critical juncture, he heard an explosion through the torrential rain. He abruptly fell back into the mud and rolled once. He was beside himself with joy as he wiped his face. "Reinforcements!"

The sound of explosions on the south end of Duanzhou erupted once again. Following close on the Biansha Cavalry's heels, Huo Lingyun relied on the firearms of this Imperial Cavalry squad to blast out a path for themselves. Exerting himself, he loaded the firearm and blasted away as he charged his way through the ranks of the Biansha Cavalry, all without wiping the rainwater off himself.

Behind, Tantai Hu could no longer hold himself back. As he drew out his blade, he shouted, “Motherfucking Biansha baldies. Your Granddaddy Hu is here!”

The vanguard squad of the Dunzhou Garrison Troops that had set off in advance was here!

Thick clouds enveloped the canopy of heaven. When the rain stopped, the city gate was once again tightly shut.

Shen Zechuan gasped for breath. His fingers were already all white from the soaking. When he dismounted from his horse, the water in his boots gushed out, and his boots made squishy sounds as he stepped across the ground. “Remove your blades and take a break.”

The Imperial Cavalrymen all dismounted one after another and stuffed themselves with food the garrison troops delivered. They replaced blades that were bent and went to the shacks at the foot of the city to rest. Time was precious. They did not even have time to change their clothing; instead, they just wrapped a thin blanket around themselves and took several sips of hot tea before leaning against the wall to sleep.

Tantai Hu took off his helmet and followed Shen Zechuan up the city wall.

Huo Lingyun followed closely behind him and reported, “I headed north along the Chashi River, and midway through, I found that the Luosha Relay Station had been massacred. I originally wanted to return to Duanzhou to report to Your Lordship, but there were too many of the Biansha Cavalry, so I headed west and lit up Dunzhou’s smoke signal tower.”

Shen Zechuan’s drenched hair plastered against his cheeks. “How is the situation in the battle zone?”

“The bridleway has been cut off,” Tantai Hu said. “Looking at it from the current situation, it’s not easy going for the battle zone either.”

The few of them reached the top of the city wall and sat on the ground behind the intact battlements. A rudimentary shed had been erected here, so it was still rather dry.

Shen Zechuan spread open the military map, and in passing, took off the agate on his right ear that was so dirty it resembled a bead of mud and put it under the clothing on his bosom. He looked at the map for a moment and said, "It's raining, and the entrances are all muddy. The Biansha Cavalry's military supplies are going to sink and get bogged down in the mud. They will not attack rashly before the sun rears its head."

"But they will not stop for too long, either." Qiao Tianya pointed at Dunzhou. "They already know that the reinforcements from Dunzhou are coming."

"The garrison troops are all infantry. They are slow on their feet. It will still take another night for the majority of the troops to rush over to Duanzhou." Tantai Hu touched the scar on his eye. "My advance squad only has two thousand men."

Fei Sheng was almost lying down. He hugged Yin Chang's blade in his arms. He no longer had any strength left to wail, and his voice had gone all hoarse. "The smoke signal tower in the southeast has been lit. We only need to defend until the night passes..."

"The Biansha Cavalry is fast." Huo Lingyun interrupted Fei Sheng. "If Hasen wants to intercept and stop Dunzhou's reinforcement, he can still make it in time if he mobilizes troops south. We can't gamble time on this night."

Hasen's advantage lay precisely in his understanding of Zhongbo's terrains. The Dunzhou Garrison Troops were not the Imperial Cavalry. They had to run on two legs. They only had to be obstructed by the Biansha Cavalry, and they would very likely stall behind Duanzhou and delay the reinforcements.

"We have to hold until reinforcements from the Bianjun Commandery arrive." Huo Lingyun traced his finger along the bridle path from the Bianjun Commandery to Duanzhou. "Second Master said it before when he headed down south. As long as Hasen moves, Commander-in-chief Qi will circle back to Gedale to launch a sneak attack from behind Hasen. No matter what, Hasen can't stay in Duanzhou's territory for long. The city walls of Duanzhou are solid, and there is no lack of food. At the very least, we can defend for another two days."

Defend for another two days.

The hearts of everyone present sank at these words.

Qiao Tianya turned his head and looked out of the battlements. "... A battle to the death, huh?"

Haze shrouded the firmament. The Chashi River, which could still be considered magnificent last night, was now reduced to a deathly white tattered cotton. After being scoured by the rain, the city walls would darken. The garrison troops continued to clean up the battlefield at the city gate. It did not matter which side the soldiers had been on. As long as they had become corpses, they would all be stacked together. The faces of those people were similarly deathly pale as they lay in the mire, like lush grass that had dried up from a lack of water.

Shen Zechuan walked down the stairs alone and headed over to the side of the water vat to wash his face. He braced himself with one arm and looked at his own right hand. He dipped his hand into the clear water, and the bloodstains on the handkerchief promptly blossomed in the water.

A-Ye's handkerchief was now dirty.

Shen Zechuan undid the handkerchief. Both of his fingers were swollen from the tight binding. He turned and sat down, then wrung the blue handkerchief dry and set it out to dry on his knees. He tilted back his head, fixing his gaze at the top.

The wind caressed the tree beside him, strewing the ground all around with fallen leaves.

And Shen Zechuan, leaning against the water vat, fell asleep.

Hasen scooped up the river water with his hands. While facing east, he buried his face in it and said his farewell. The heads by his feet had been strung together. His scimitar was stained red with fresh blood, and his newly cut leather clothing revealed both of his wrists. Hidden away in the pocket of his sleeves was the flower of Chiti<sup>13</sup> that Duo'erlan had given him.

The aged wise one cupped the river water in his hands and raised them to pour the water over Hasen's head. "May the gods bless and protect the Heroic Eagle of the Hanshe Tribe."

Hasen lifted his dripping wet face and looked at the wise one as he asked, "Will I win?"

The wise one leaned over and stroked Hasen's forehead, his cloudy eyes bearing the weight of the river. He seemed to be even older than the Chashi River was. His wisdom was not one that Bayin could match. He kneeled, cupped Hasen's cheeks, and answered slowly, "You are already standing in a place we have not gone before."

“There’s still a wolf ahead standing guard,” Hasen said. “I killed his father.”

“The King of Wolves killed your brothers and sisters.” The wise one’s aging face was just like the barren sand dunes in the desert. “The compassion bestowed upon by the Heavenly God of Chiti comes accompanied by pain. He took away the grasslands and the blue sky; we are already committed to fight to the bitter end where only one of us is left standing.”

Water droplets dripped from Hasen’s chin. After a moment of silence, he said in a quiet voice, “I will win.”

Shen Zechuan was startled awake by the sound of artillery bombardment. He felt cold all over the very instant he opened his eyes. Under the flurry of footsteps, he swiftly secured the handkerchief back on his hand and rose to his feet.

“Light the fire!”

Torches around him lit up in a flash. Shen Zechuan stepped up the stairs to the top of the city wall.

“There are still Biansha Cavalrymen crossing the river.” Fei Sheng looked out into the distance. “They are gathering in the direction of Duanzhou.”

Shen Zechuan drank up the ginger soup Qiao Tianya handed him. “Hasen is here.”

“The Biansha Cavalry has split up into flanks.” Cold sweat broke out on Fei Sheng’s back. “This is bad. They’re going to charge from three sides!”

The Biansha Cavalry seemed like an eagle who was in the midst of spreading its wings open. The center came together to form a horde, their numbers far exceeded those in the daytime. Meanwhile, the two flanks of the Biansha Cavalry bearing torches and taking a detour dashed at lightning speed.

“Notify the south and north gates.” Shen Zechuan smashed the bowl and raised his voice. “Be on guard and defend to the death!”

Before the words were fully out of his mouth, half of the battlement near him collapsed with a “bang”. The Imperial Cavalry and Garrison Troops all broke into a run, while the archers hoisted up their bows on the battered battlement and drew their bows.

Unlike the two flanks, Hasen's center squad did not move. He put all his catapults and single-branch cannons to use. Heavy rocks came hurtling over in torrents at the Duanzhou city wall, the impact so strong it sent debris of the wall flying all over. The archers could not keep a steady hand on their bows at all.

The Biansha Cavalrymen beside Hasen erected their banners, and the cavalrymen in the rear all abandoned their drums. Instead, they held up their horns and blew them. The two flanks had already reached the north and south gates. The north gates released a batch of arrows, although the south gate could only hurl farming tools.

The advisors in the riding stables were all taking a short break when they suddenly heard a resounding crash from the gate. The women and children present promptly broke out crying in alarm as they huddled together.

"They are attacking the city!" Gao Zhongxiong started trembling as he hugged his papers and brushes close to him.

The battering ram did not succeed the first time, and not a moment later, an even heavier crash rang out. The outermost city gate broke apart at once, and the shouts of the Biansha Cavalry permeated through the overhanging gate. The commoners present were all in a panic now as they frantically jostled their way backward.

A garrison troop soldier at the top of the city wall leaped down and drew his blade, shouting to the crowd, "Run for the alley!"

He had yet to finish his words when the battering ram slammed into the overhanging gate with a loud crash, sending forth a spray of wood splinters and creating a hole in it.

The garrison troop soldier raised a hand, his sweat and tears flowing as he gasped violently for breath. At the very moment the battering ram sent the lower side of the overhanging door flying, he took the lead and broke into a run, brandishing his blade as he charged and shouted, "Slay the enemies!"

With Kong Ling pushing the wheelchair, the advisors followed behind the commoners as they flooded towards the residential areas.

The garrison troops could not hold up against the Biansha Cavalry's assault. Scimitars scythed across the garrison troops' heads as though they were reaping harvest. The sounds of hooves never stopped at all as they charged right into the running crowd.

The advisors had already dashed over to the entrance of the alley, choked full with commoners inside. A woman had to pull along several children in tow and carry an elder on her back. All the young and strong had already taken up their places before the overhanging gate, and all those who remained here were totally powerless to fight back in the face of the Biansha Cavalry.

Gao Zhongxiong's papers fell off along his arms. His legs were shaking, as was his body. Before he could squeeze his way in, a Biansha Cavalryman hooked the back of his collar and dragged his entire body over. Gao Zhongxiong yelled in terror, his tears and mucus flowing profusely.

The Biansha Cavalryman said something and spat at Gao Zhongxiong.

Gao Zhongxiong, at the end of his rope seeing no way out, summoned up a burst of strength out of nowhere and spat at the Biansha Cavalryman too. He shouted, "A scholar would rather die than be humiliated!"

The Biansha Cavalryman fell off his horse with a thud. Swinging a bar of door blot<sup>14</sup> he had picked up at random, Kong Ling urged, "Quick, Shenwei, run!"

Covering the back of his head, the Biansha Cavalryman clambered to his feet and felt for his scimitar.

Gao Zhongxiong had initially taken a few steps back. Seeing as Kong Ling was about to fall behind, he yanked over the cloth bundle under his arm, which still had brushes and an ink slab in it, without even thinking and slammed it right at the head of the Biansha Cavalryman, sending the cavalryman, who was caught off guard, back to the ground.

Without throwing the bar away, Kong Ling lifted the hem of his robe and pushed Gao Zhongxiong into moving. Both of them then ran for the alley. Gao Zhongxiong was still turning his head, looking at his bundle as he cried and said, "That, that ink slab of mine was really expensive!"

Qiao Tianya galloped past, leading a column of Imperial Cavalry head-on into the Biansha Cavalry. Both parties start battling and slaying each other in the darkness. The commoners in the alley covered their mouths, only daring to whimper and not wail as they listened to the violent sounds of fighting at close quarters. A constant stream of garrison troops ran past.

Yao Wenyu turned his wheelchair, keeping close to the edge, but he could not hear any sound from Qiao Tianya.

After an hour, torches suddenly lit up at the entrance of the alley.

Wiping his chin that was dripping with blood, Qiao Tianya raised his head slightly at the interior. His gaze swept past Yao Wenyu to Kong Ling. “May I trouble Mister Chengfeng to lead everyone back to the residence?”

Kong Ling repeatedly answered in the affirmative. Only then did he throw away the bar in his hands. He hurried forward and called out the commoners to follow. Gao Zhongxiong hurriedly bent down to pick up his papers.

Amidst the weaving flames, Qiao Tianya moved aside a few steps and pressed in towards Yao Wenyu.

Yao Wenyu said, “His Lordship—”

The wheelchair bumped lightly against the wall. Yuanzhuo suddenly grabbed the armrest with a hand to brace himself as Qiao Tianya cupped his cheeks and walled him in this dark, gloomy corner for a kiss. This kiss was not at all gentle. It blazed with astounding desire under the taste of blood.

Qiao Tianya abruptly let go of Yao Wenyu. He wiped down Yuanzhuo’s bloodstained chin for him and stepped back quickly, then got on his horse and left, leaving Yao Wenyu behind, covering his chin in shock.

Hasen cracked his horsewhip. He led the elites to break across the trench and charge towards the east gate with mud in tow and the battering rams following behind him.

Tantai Hu waved his arm and said, “Get ready.”

The mounted crossbow at the top of the city wall clicked into action. A dozen soldiers from the garrison troops propped up the long arrows. This mounted crossbow with exceptional destructive power could only be used to deal with Hasen, but it was tough to find the opportune moment; they had to first make Hasen retreat.

The water surface in the trench rippled. Hasen’s horse had only just landed on the ground when a blade came at him head-on. He urgently held up his scimitar and blocked the blow. Through the flames and dust, he saw Shen Zechuan.

Neither man gained a lead over the other in their first confrontation. At the very instant they sidestepped each other, they obtained a measure of the other.

Hasen’s red hair inclined slightly as he spun his scimitar and pointed the blade at Shen Zechuan, as if taking aim at him. He said with precision, “Shen Zechuan.”

Shen Zechuan lightly grazed past the blade. Feng Ta Shuang Yi raised its hooves and stepped around Hasen, and Shen Zechuan suddenly slashed off the head of the Biansha Cavalry tagging along with Hasen.

Hasen remembered Xiao Chiye. Xiao Chiye had sent Achi's head back. This was a humiliation of sorts, reminiscent of how he too had taken away Xiao Fangxu's head.

Both sides were at the point of no return, and steel blades clashed several times. The Biansha Cavalry pushed the Imperial Cavalry back, and the Imperial Cavalry stubbornly pushed them back again. The hooves of their horses weaved among each other in the mud. Men kept plunging into the trench, turning into mire.

The garrison troops at the top of the city wall shoved the remaining heavy rocks down, but an endless stream of replacements kept filling in for the cavalymen who were knocked down. It was as if there was no end to it no matter how many they killed.

Shen Zechuan was different from all the opponents Hasen had encountered. He still had his wits about him even in the face of such a critical assault. Perhaps he was not as strong as Hasen, but he was sufficiently cunning. All of Hasen's forceful attacks went smashing into the water. That was an elusive sense of powerlessness—this was the most thorny opponent.

Hasen retracted his scimitar and drew out his piked dagger.

Kerosene splashed all over at the top of the city wall, and it started burning all around. Hasen made the first move, blocking the trajectory of Yang Shan Xue's diagonal slash. The battle steed suddenly charged forward, pressing up against Feng Ta Shuang Yi as it rammed Shen Zechuan back towards the city gate with brute force.

Forward charge!

Yang Shan Xue nearly slipped off his hand. The hilt pressed against both Shen Zechuan's fingers so hard that his fingers were almost contorted. Shen Zechuan, however, did not feel it. He forcibly turned the hilt and used his remaining three fingers to grasp it such that the back of the blade bumped against his forearm. Just like that one move of Yin Chang, he held up the blade with his elbow at the same time he turned around to slash it towards Hasen's throat.

Hasen bent over to dodge the blow, and holding his piked dagger in a reverse grip, dealt out a strike at Shen Zechuan's chest. With a lightning move of his hand, Shen Zechuan caught hold of Hasen's wrist, but his strength was not enough, and in this blink of an eye between life and death, he abruptly pressed Hasen's piked dagger down so that Hasen's forward thrust only stabbed him at the side of his waist, avoiding the vital points.

"Your Lordship!" Watching Hasen attack from the top of the city wall gave Tantai Hu such a fright that his soul nearly took leave of him.

Having stabbed Shen Zechuan in the waist, Hasen attempted to retreat, only to realize that the fingers grabbing him were like steel nails.

Shen Zechuan's eyes were grim as he said, "Shove."

The Imperial Cavalry that seemed to be in disarray behind him instantly reorganized and followed Shen Zechuan to withdraw back to the center, where they then swarmed towards this one squad of Hasen.

We've been had!

Hasen pulled out his piked dagger. The Imperial Cavalry's battle steeds had already come barging over. His squad of vanguards was promptly slammed back, and the horses in the rear all fell butt first into the trench. The mounted crossbow had already been hoisted up; however, it still was not enough.

Shen Zechuan barked, "Shove again!"

The passage planks over the trench were all more or less broken. River water splashed, and the rain of fire from the top of the city wall was still falling. Hasen's assault charge had already fallen apart. In his retreat, he violently rolled off his horse, taking Shen Zechuan along with him.

Shen Zechuan fell into the mud. Without even pausing to wipe his face, he rolled over first to draw out some distance between him and Hasen. He was filthy through and through, and there was no way to tell where he was bleeding. Drops of blood fused into the mud and water, masked under the surging beats of hooves.

Hasen knew to seize his opportunity. In the few blows he had traded with Shen Zechuan earlier, he had already seen through him. This man's physical strength had been exhausted to the point that he was not his match at all. He pounced, and took advantage of the splattering muddy water to immediately flash his way in front of Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan parried the blow with his blade and was knocked back half a step by the impact of Hasen's force. Before Hasen could stand firm, Shen Zechuan protruded a foot and swept Hasen off his feet. Hasen braced himself against the ground with one hand and immediately sprang back.

The piked dagger between his fingers twirled around with unusual dexterity. Shen Zechuan dodged it, and Yang Shan Xue and the piked dagger struck against each other in a collective “crack”.

With a piece of quick thinking, Tantai Hu raised his hands and bellowed, “Release a fire attack to cover His Lordship!”

Braving the blasts from the cannons, the garrison troops at the top of the city wall drew their bows. As expected, Hasen retreated a little. It was only when he got a clear look at the top of the city wall he knew he had fallen for it again—there was no more kerosene left at the top of the city wall. Before he could retract his gaze, he felt a sudden weight on his chest as Shen Zechuan kicked him back. As Hasen fell backward, he grasped hold of Shen Zechuan’s ankle, dragging Shen Zechuan to the ground as well.

Mud splashed all over. The handkerchief loosened, and the three fingers that could still feel failed to hold on tight to Yang Shan Xue, which fell over to one side. Shen Zechuan coughed out blood. He attempted to rise to his feet, but failed.

Hasen agilely straightened up. Seeing that Shen Zechuan was about to grasp his blade, he dragged Shen Zechuan by the ankle and hauled him backward. From where he was in the mud, Shen Zechuan grabbed at empty air. He resolutely gave up on Yang Shan Xue. With one hand, he pressed down on his waist where he was injured, and flipped to his feet, relying on the physical strength of his waist.

These few moves were really going to be the death of him!

Gasping hard for breath, Shen Zechuan elbowed Hasen in the face hard. The Ji Clan Boxing Style was fierce and hard-hitting, and the force of it caused Hasen to let go of his hand. However, he reacted quickly. The piked dagger slipped from his right hand and landed into his left hand, which he thrust right at Shen Zechuan’s throat, catching him unawares.

Unable to block with one arm, he swiftly clamped down on Hasen’s left hand with both arms and leaned the upper half of his body slightly. The piked dagger stopped right within a hair’s breadth of him. Blood spilled between Shen Zechuan’s teeth. With the metallic taste of blood in his mouth, he twisted over Hasen’s left hand and raised his knee to slam it into Hasen’s chest as Hasen was leaning over towards him.

Hasen instantly fell to the ground.

Shen Zechuan turned his head side to spit out the blood. When Hasen raised his head, he smashed a fist into Hasen’s head, knocking it askew.

Hasen turned his face away and grabbed hold of Shen Zechuan's forearm with his bare hands. At the same time Shen Zechuan retracted his strength, Hasen flipped over, bringing Shen Zechuan falling down with him into the mud once again.

Shen Zechuan's right arm was dislocated. As he fell to the ground, he gripped the side of Hasen's collar and called out, "Tantai Hu!"

Tantai Hu roared, "Release the arrows!"

Sparks sprayed all around the mounted crossbow. At the very moment the long arrow sprang forth, it hurtled right towards Hasen with a trail of swift and fierce wind following in its wake! Hasen yanked Shen Zechuan up and rolled backward to lunge right into the trench. The arrow of the mounted crossbow went crashing into the trench, stirring up a billow of waves.

Shen Zechuan gulped in a few mouthfuls of filthy water, which choked him until his head was swimming. Throughout it all, Hasen did not release his grip on him. Dragging Shen Zechuan along, he climbed his way to the opposite side of the trench.

"Your head." Hasen pulled out the scimitar by the side of his waist again. "I'm going to gift it to Xiao Chiye."

With his neck tilting up, Shen Zechuan spat out the muddy sediment amidst his gasp for breath and let loose a laugh. His expressive eyes that were partially closed appeared particularly nefarious as he said, "The wind is here."

Hasen scythed his scimitar over, but Shen Zechuan instantly raised a leg to stomp hard on Hasen's chest. In the very instant that he did so, he grabbed the dagger at the side of his leg with his left hand and caught Hasen's scimitar in its track.

With the scimitar stuck, Hasen strained himself to inch backward.

Shen Zechuan had already landed on the ground. Snagging the scimitar from his dagger, Shen Zechuan landed another blow right in Hasen's face when Hasen retreated back. Hasen tilted over and staggered. Imitating Shen Zechuan's earlier action, he crouched and swept out a leg without warning.

Shen Zechuan did not fall!

Hasen braced himself against the ground to get up. Right at this moment, a burst of what sounded like the wind being ripped once again erupted in the air. A sharp arrow followed in the wake of a burst of muffled thunder and, along with the torrential rainstorm, stabbed into the ground beside Hasen.

The Conqueror Bow, soaking in the rain.

That was not muffled thunder from the sky, but thunderclaps on the ground. The heavy cavalry thundered as they stomped across the ground, even crashing away the rainwater as they charged like an overbearing, ferocious beast pouncing out of the dark night. Lang Tao Xue Jin charged through the curtain of rain, and Xiao Chiye, awash in blood all over, came killing like a bolt of jet-black lightning from the horizon to the battlefield.

The passage of heavy frost through the lands.<sup>15</sup>

The wolf was here.

CHAPTER 251: RESOUNDING VICTORY

Hasen stood up as the ground quaked and turned back to see the thunderclouds billowing over to where he was.

The torrential rain washed over the Armored Cavalry and splashed among the hooves along with the splatter of mud. As the pack of wolves howled and dashed, the intimidating sense of oppressiveness, which had not made an appearance in a long time, swept across the battlefield. This was the edge that belonged to the Libei Armored Cavalry.

The moment Xiao Chiye appeared on the battlefield of Zhongbo, Hasen's swift assault failed. He did not manage to storm into the City of Duanzhou. Instead, he lost his brave general and elites here. Staying any longer would be a drain on resources. He ought to withdraw his soldiers at this time.

The vanguards at the city gate had already turned their horses around, while the messengers at the back of the trench brandished the Hongying banner in between gallops. The Libei Armored Cavalry that formed a long dragon intercepted access to the southeast, so the Scorpions pushed their siege weapons and began to retreat towards the Chashi River in the east.

The city gate opened soon after, and Tantai Hu led the garrison troops, who had been holding back for two days, out in a charge with blades in hands. With all his might, he shouted, "Second Master is here!"

With his scimitar, Hasen flipped onto an empty horse. He commanded in the Biansha tongue for the elites to fall out and split into two barriers bringing up the rear. They were to obstruct the Imperial Cavalry and Libei

Armored Cavalry in the west and southeast, so as to buy time for the withdrawing military supplies squad in the center.

“Your Lordship!” Huo Lingyun spurred his horse on with one hand and rushed over to Shen Zechuan with Feng Ta Shuang Yi in tow.

Shen Zechuan picked up Yang Shan Xue with his left hand. He did not mount his horse, but watched as Hasen led the elites in a gallop south to face Xiao Chiye head-on in a battle.

The Prefectural Lord said, “Ready.”

Huo Lingyun reacted swiftly. From where he was on his horse, he raised his arm and shouted towards the city wall, “Ready—!”

Hasen’s back figure was just about to disappear into the heavy rain, but his red hair was far too conspicuous, like an illuminated live target in the rain. Shen Zechuan looked at him as if he was staring at a moving rabbit.

Hasen seemed to sense something under the raindrops, and he looked back to see Shen Zechuan saying something through the rainstorm.

The mounted crossbow at the top of the city wall fired at once. Massive arrows, which resembled an ox cart rampaging in the air, shot its way behind Hasen in the blink of an eye. Hasen was forced to dismount at this critical juncture as the swift torrents of rain splattered all over. At the very instant he rolled, those huge arrows crashed into the squad of elite cavalry, knocking them off to the ground. The ponies could not dodge in time at all, and those that were struck were all killed on the spot.

The ponies neighed in alarm and tumbled over into the mud. Sprays of blood instantly spurted. This squad was now broken up. The mounted crossbow struck terror in the hearts of the Biansha Cavalry. Its superior killing power was not something that one man alone could withstand. Every time it appeared on the battlefield, it would result in countless casualties.

Hasen crawled to his feet and suddenly swung his scimitar in front to intercept Xiao Chiye’s Langli Blade! However, Xiao Chiye was not Shen Zechuan. Hasen’s scimitar paused for only a split second when Xiao Chiye slammed it down to the ground, causing it to nearly slip from his hand.

This strength was too terrifying!

Hasen’s entire body sank along with it. He steadied his scimitar with both hands and bellowed as he attempted to lift it.

Xiao Chiye was not wearing a helmet. Rainwater trickled down along his temples, and filthy blood that had yet to be scoured clean by the rain slid across his facial features. He slowly dragged Langli Blade, and at this moment when he looked down on Hasen, he flashed a spine-chilling smile.

“I. Was. Looking. For. You.”

The sound of the rain raged. Dark, gloomy clouds blotted out the sky, threatening to crush down on the battlefield. Thunder crashed close overhead. In the darkness, Hasen saw the fangs of the wolf.

The scimitar slammed sideways, letting Langli Blade slip away.

The instant Hasen retreated, Lang Tao Xue Jin's front hooves stomped down on the footprints he had left behind and sent up a splash of dirty filth. The surrounding Biansha Cavalry and the Libei Armored Cavalry clashed together into a chaotic whole. The Armored Cavalry's brand new blades had their fills of fresh blood over at Bianjun, so sharp were they as if they were roaring right now. As Hasen swiftly retreated, he got on his horse once again. Langli Blade suddenly came attacking right in his face, and his horse took several steps back in response. Xiao Chiye pressed in every step of the way, as if revitalized.

Tantai Hu sprang up and jumped into the Biansha Cavalry, who was attempting to withdraw. Swinging his blade, he first hacked off the ponies' legs, then led his men to chase after the Scorpions who were moving their weapons. He squeezed out a fiendish smile and said, “To hell with you! Pay with your lives, Baldies!”

Duanzhou finally began to launch a counteroffensive. The Imperial Cavalry raced across the trench, pushing the surge of the Biansha Cavalry towards the east. The Armored Cavalry squad near the riverbanks of the Chashi River intercepted along the north of the river, severing the path right at the riverside where the Biansha Cavalry were dashing back. Together with the garrison troops and Imperial Cavalry, they formed a three-way encirclement to force the Biansha Cavalry into gathering at the open space in the center.

The only opening still left now was in the north, but Hasen hesitated to order a retreat to the north, because the north was close to Shasan Camp. He was worried that this was a deliberate trap Xiao Chiye left for him, and he was even more worried that Lu Guangbai was lying in ambush in the north. He was already virtually in a dead-end, besieged on all sides.

Langli Blade cleaved towards his throat, and Hasen nimbly bent over to dodge the blow. At the same time he parried the blade, he commanded in the Biansha tongue, “Switch vanguards!”

The elites who were meeting the Libei Armored Cavalry's attack instantly retreated. Seizing their opportunity, the Scorpions formed a diagonal wall in the southeast. As they spurred their ponies on, they swung their hammers high.

Langli Blade suddenly lifted, the face of the blade catching the rapidly drumming raindrop as it lay leveled in mid-air, like the last chain that tethered the Armored Cavalry. Xiao Chiye did not move, and neither did the Armored Cavalry behind him.

"CHARGE!" Hasen commanded.

The hooves of the Scorpions' ponies galloped into the mud. At the same time the mix of muddy water and rainwater hit them in their faces, they yelled out in the Biansha tongue.

Xiao Chiye lowered his arms. Before the garrison troops at the top of the city wall could get a clear look, they heard the Armored Cavalry simultaneously returning their blades to their sheath—the Armored Cavalry was actually keeping away their blades at this time.

Standing in front, Xiao Chiye twirled out his new long blade. It was as if the Armored Cavalry had flung off their iron sheet cover. Loud clangs simultaneously rang out, revealing uniformly-colored long blades on the flanks of the horses. The long blade had never seen blood back at the Bianjun Commandery. These blades had only revealed their prowess at the Chashi Sinkhole. And now, as they soaked in the rain, it was still rainwater dripping off the shiny tips of the blades.

The Scorpions' iron hammers swung before them, and the Libei Armored Cavalry suddenly opened up. They broke up the vanguard squad and swiftly shifted over to both sides to allow the Scorpions to gallop in unimpeded. The Scorpions were midway through when Hasen had a sense of foreboding. However, his order to withdraw would not make its way here at all, because the Armored Cavalry vanguard squads on both sides had started to gallop back.

Xiao Chiye charged at the very front and brushed past the Scorpions. Thunder crashed in fury, and the sound of rain intensified. The Scorpions' hammers had not even come close when the long blades slashed off their heads.

The Libei Armored Cavalry at the southeast were just like fortified iron cages as they "ate" the Scorpions, pushing them even deeper into an encirclement trap. Then they snuffed out the lives of the Scorpions with their long blades right there and then, just like what Xiao Chiye did.

The Armored Cavalry flashed their blades in unison, followed right after by the sound of heads tumbling.

Hasen instantly commanded, "Break out from the east!"

He could not continue to battle on. Whatever advantages the Biansha Cavalry had vanished entirely here. All that awaited the Scorpions when they charged into the Armored Cavalry's encirclement was slaughter. Hasen risked a surprise attack on Duanzhou, and he had already lost too much here. He had to immediately cut his losses and break out of the encirclement and cross the river as soon as possible.

The Scorpions at the back abandoned their fights. They mounted their horses and urged on the infantry hauling the weapons as all of them charged eastward.

Hasen galloped in the rain. Icy rainwater pounded on his cheeks. He stared ahead, killing a bloody way out at breakneck speed, but the sound of hooves suddenly rang out beside him as Lang Tao Xue Jin kept up in hot pursuit. Hasen's scimitar chipped as he parried the blow. Xiao Chiye's speed was even faster. Both men spared no efforts galloping, charging in the rainstorm like an artillery shell!

Hasen broke through to the very edge. The Gobi on the banks of the Chashi River was just right ahead. The Biansha Cavalry that had gone into the water engaged in an intense battle with the Imperial Army that was lying in ambush here. The shallows were already an expanse of red.

Hasen galloped into the river. Lang Tao Xue Jin slammed into the side of the battle steed's neck, knocking Hasen's horse askew. He had to pull the reins to control it. Xiao Chiye brandished his blade to cut off Hasen's reins, and the horse powerlessly turned its body and tumbled into the shallows with Hasen in tow.

Hasen rolled the moment he landed on the ground. He lost his piked dagger at the edge of the trench when he fought with Shen Zechuan, and all he had now were his scimitar and dagger. The sound of killing around him was deafening. He scooped up the river water with his freed hand and wiped his eyes clean of the dirty blood obscuring them.

Xiao Chiye landed on the ground too, his tall, strapping body blocking off Hasen's eastward-looking gaze, becoming the mountain standing between Hasen and the desert. Hasen brought his bent scimitar before his chest and adjusted his breathing. At the same time Xiao Chiye sprang towards him, he lunged over.

The sound of blades clashing jarred on the ears.

Xiao Chiye pressed his blade against Hasen's scimitar and pushed Hasen back. With some difficulty, Hasen stabilized himself. Rainwater pounded on his blade. At the very instant they splashed away, he abruptly withdrew his blade and dodged aside to evade the blow as Langli Blade swept forward.

River water splashed all over along with their footsteps.

Xiao Chiye's cheeks were still stained with residual blood on them. His combat style of only advancing and not retreating seemed like the moves of a desperado, revealing an intense desire to go on the offensive. Every slash of his numbed Hasen's arms. Under the intensive assault of Langli Blade, his scimitar near about turned into scrap metal.

Hasen abruptly tumbled over amidst Xiao Chiye's hacks. As he was about to fall into the water, he forcibly braced himself with his arms and raised his body. Then he squatted and lifted his blade to block the blow once again.

Without changing his posture, Xiao Chiye simply pressed down on him with all his might. Under the force of it, Hasen's scimitar slowly shifted down close to his shoulder. He could even feel Langli Blade's sharpness. A ragged gasp escaped from Hasen's throat. The downward pressure from Xiao Chiye was making his legs hurt, and they were already beginning to bend downward.

Hasen would never kneel to Xiao Chiye.

Untold numbers of people had starved to death when the Twelve Tribes kneeled before Dazhou. He had come this far all just to find that one way out for themselves. Hasen held Lake Chiti dear. Yet, for countless years, he had been sleeping among blades and swords. He had never once bowed to the Armored Cavalry. He was the Heroic Eagle soaring in the blue dome of heaven.

Hasen did his best to hold up against Xiao Chiye's strength. He bellowed and roused himself to hoist up Langli Blade. Brazenly, he lunged forward and very nearly sliced Xiao Chiye's neck.

Xiao Chiye took a sudden step back and bent his elbow to knock away Hasen's scimitar. The horse beside him neighed and fell over. Hasen flipped his dagger out and lunged again before Xiao Chiye could attack. Unable to turn Langli Blade around in time, Xiao Chiye let go of the hilt and blocked the dagger with the arm guard on his right arm. His left hand clenched into a fist, and he socked Hasen into the water.

A spray of water exploded forth from Hasen's fall. He coughed out water and lunged before Xiao Chiye came up to him. Wrapping his arms around Xiao Chiye's waist, he hooked his leg around Xiao Chiye to trip him and knock him down into the water. Water splashed. In a countermove, Xiao Chiye grasped the back of Hasen's collar tightly and held him in a chokehold from behind.

Hasen could barely breathe. He thrust his dagger out and struck heavy armor. He immediately gave up and jabbed the dagger at Xiao Chiye's eyes. Xiao Chiye could only let go and moved back to evade it. Hasen swapped tactics and wrapped his arms around Xiao Chiye's arm, then he turned to the side and flung Xiao Chiye over his shoulder.

Hasen held down Xiao Chiye's face so that Xiao Chiye could not breathe in the fast-flowing river. He clasped his dagger and made to cut off Xiao Chiye's head. Xiao Chiye backhandedly grabbed hold of the dagger. At the same time the blade sank into his flesh, he arbitrarily straightened up and slammed into Hasen's jaw.

Hasen's eyes watered. In this split second of vulnerability, Xiao Chiye elbowed him in the chest. He did not manage to stop the spurt of blood from his mouth.

Xiao Chiye released the dagger, and clenching his bleeding hand into a fist, he once again punched Hasen over to the ground.

This one blow was too brutal.

Hasen was bleeding from his nose and mouth. He was even a little dizzy. The sound of combat and killing alternated close and far. The heavy downpour blurred the scenery. As he braced himself with his arms, he realized his leather sleeve had split, and the flower of Chiti in his sleeve pocket drifted away with the water. Hasen did not manage to catch the flower, and in the blink of an eye, hooves trampled the flower to a pulp.

Xiao Chiye pulled up Langli Blade again, both of his eyes wet. Hasen had seen such a wolf before. It was with such a gaze that Xiao Chiye had chased him for dozens of li in that heavy snow.

The Libei Armored Cavalry broke up the Biansha Cavalry, leaving them with no way to flee along the banks of the Chashi River. The river water of the shallows was thoroughly red, and floating corpses piled up around the corner. The heavy rain soaked everyone's face white. Hasen never got to wait until the reinforcements he left at Gedale arrived.

As Hasen gasped for breath, he raised his head in the rain. He could not see over Xiao Chiye's shoulder at the opposite bank of the Chashi River. He dejectedly murmured to himself in silence. "May the gods bless—"

Langli Blade suddenly thrust into the shallows. Blood flowed down along the blade to disperse in the water. With a thud, Hasen's body fell to its knees in the rapid currents before falling face-first into the waters.

Xiao Chiye's chest heaved under the clamor of the rainstorm. The sounds of hooves behind him ceased. In the boundless expanse of heaven and earth, the Armored Cavalry all looked at him. Facing the Chashi River, Xiao Chiye raised his arm that was lifting the red hair.

Only the sound of the rapids could be heard in the long, endless silence.

Tantai Hu waded two steps through the water. He tossed his blade away and cried out straight ahead, "WE WON!"

"We..." The Armored Cavalry's throats let loose repressed chokes of sobs before they erupted in earth-shaking roars, "WE ARE WOLVES!"

The shadow of gloom hanging over them for as long as half a year finally ebbed away. Blood of countless people flowed in the Chashi River that ran through the north and south. In the torrential rainstorm, Libei reclaimed its dignity.

Xiao Chiye clenched his fists tight, his eyes silently reddening.

CHAPTER 252: FRONTIER LIZARD

The rain subsided, and Xiao Chiye withdrew back to the city gate of Duanzhou. The garrison troops started to work nonstop cleaning up the battlefield. The water in the trench, having already overflowed, soaked the segment of the path before the gate into a soggy mess. Hooves treading past here were all covered in mud, and everyone was dirty through and through.

Shen Zechuan stood before the city gate and watched as Lang Tao Xue Jin galloped closer. Xiao Chiye leaned over from the back of his horse, and Shen Zechuan lifted his right arm to trade light bumps with him. Gazing at Shen Zechuan, Xiao Chiye did not retract his arm. Instead, he turned his hand over to lift it close to Shen Zechuan's chin. In the rain, and with his eyes lowered, he and Shen Zechuan mutually pressed their foreheads together.

The rain enveloped both men deep in its embrace.

Shen Zechuan closed his eyes. Rainwater trickled along his eyelashes and dripped onto the bridge of Xiao Chiye's nose. He slowly smiled and gradually laughed out loud.

Qiao Tianya rode his horse over. Midway through, he reined his horse to a stop. Leaning over to look at Ji Gang, he asked, "Where's shifu going?"

Ji Gang stood at the entrance of the passageway for a while before tossing the overcoat in his hands to Qiao Tianya. He looked at the curtain of rain.

Qiao Tianya draped the overcoat over himself. "Shifu, the Ji Clan Boxing Fist's name will once again spread far and wide after this battle. The Old Senior Ji can rest in peace if he were to learn of it.”

Ji Gang looked up at the sky, and rainwater splashed into his eyes. After a long time, he said, “Duanzhou is going to have a bumper harvest this year.”

Qiao Tianya smiled.

Putting his hands behind his back, Ji Gang turned around and let loose a long sigh. Not looking at Shen Zechuan any further, he said, “Hurry and summon the physician over!”

The rain did not stop until the hour of mao the next day. The bamboo tubes in the courtyard kept up with its tapping against the mossy rocks. Wrapped in a short-lined jacket, Ding Tao stood guard with Li Xiong in the hallway and watched as the physicians entered and exited.

“I’m thirsty,” Li Xiong said.

Clutching his book, Ding Tao whispered, “Then go pour yourself some water to drink. I’m going to stand guard here.”

Li Xiong looked reluctant as he blocked the hallway and shook his head vigorously, unwilling to go alone.

Inside, Kong Ling lifted the hanging screen and led the physician out with a grave expression.

Fei Sheng had only just woken up and had come over to be on duty. Seeing them emerge, he immediately stepped forth to take over and had his subordinate lead the physician to the side hall. He asked Kong Ling, “Mister, how’s Master?”

Kong Ling shook his head and walked into the room again with him. He said in a hushed tone, “Don’t make a din when you enter later and disturb His Lordship. Second Master is on tenterhooks right now. He has been waiting inside the whole night without sleeping.”

Fei Sheng did not dare to say a word more and followed Kong Ling into the room, where he saw the bamboo blinds lowered in the inner chamber.

Xiao Chiye, who had removed his armor, was in the midst of reading the prescription. The physician who had yet to leave stood primly opposite the Second Master, bowing as he said in a soft voice, “... It’ll prove difficult for him to hold a blade again in the future... Those two fingers...”

Fei Sheng had an ill sense of foreboding when he heard these two sentences. His heart sank as he looked at Xiao Chiye's grave expression, so oppressively intimidating was it that those waiting in attendance inside were all as silent as cicadas in winter.

"His waist... and calf..."

And the right arm Hasen almost detached.

Shen Zechuan still looked fine when he had just returned yesterday. It was only when he washed his face clean that they could see just how ghastly pale his complexion was. The two fingers on his right hand were already swollen to begin with, and then he had fallen into the trench during his fight with Hasen, where he had further aggravated it from the grappling and soaking in the filthy water. His right hand could not move at all. In the end, he even had to use his left hand to lift Yang Shan Xue. He did not return to the city immediately; instead, he put on a carefree, laidback act. In truth, the wound on his waist had torn open when he straightened up, and getting on the horse proved to be too difficult for him, so he could only use all his willpower to hang on and pretend all was fine while letting Huo Lingyun lead the horse instead.

The instant Shen Zechuan's nerves that had been stretched taut with tension relaxed, the aftereffect of getting drenched in the rain kicked in. He thought he was asleep, but in fact, he was in a semi-coma. Last night's fever came raging with vehemence, and even now, it had yet to subside. He vomited everything he ate. His stomach was all stuffed with hard steamed buns, and after puking them all out, he regurgitated bile.

The lowered drapes were opaque. Xiao Chiye waited for the physician to leave before he opened up a slit to look at Lanzhou.

Lanzhou's hair spread out among the bedding. Unable to curl up, he half-laid on the side that was not injured, revealing a little of his side profile. The upturned corner of his eye did not have its usual seductive allure. He looked as if he was sleeping normally.

Xiao Chiye touched the corner of his eye. He did not move. As long as Xiao Chiye was by his side, he would dare to be this unguarded. He looked very, very small, completely enveloped by Xiao Chiye's figure.

Xiao Chiye had difficulty breathing. It hurt everywhere in his chest. He leaned over and kissed Lanzhou on his temple. His fingertips moved ever so lightly, as if he was caressing a baby cub that was still a fluff of fur.

The physicians in the courtyard came and went. They fed the Prefectural Lord a bowl of medicine, and Shen Zechuan puked it out again at the hour of si. Seeing that it did not work, Ji Gang hoisted the physician over to continue taking a look at Shen Zechuan. The side hall was crammed full of people. The joy of having survived a calamity had not even passed, and already the residence was shrouded in a cloud of gloom.

During the hour of shen, the military reports from the battle zone arrived. They were stacked together with the military reports from the Bianjun Commandery, pressing Xiao Chiye to read them. Xiao Chiye did not dare to leave Shen Zechuan, so he had it all sent to the side hall and took the time he used to drink water to stand in the side hall, where he read the military reports while listening to the physicians rattle off the prescriptions all at the same time.

Ding Tao did not dare to stir up any trouble at this moment. Leading Li Xiong by the sleeve, he said, "There's a water jar at the foot of the walkway. I'll pour you a cup."

Li Xiong did not move his feet. He rubbed his nose and nodded unhappily.

Unable to pull Li Xiong into moving, Ding Tao asked in puzzlement, "Why aren't you moving?"

Li Xiong did not make a sound as he looked at someone coming over from the moon gate. Fei Sheng was leading a newly arrived physician inside. They crossed the walkway in the blink of an eye, and with a lift of the hanging screen, they entered the room, where Kong Ling and the other gentlemen were keeping watch in the outer room.

This newly-arrived physician looked decent and had a Fanzhou accent as he said, "His Lordship mustn't get caught in the rain with this body of his. Given the way he's vomiting, he certainly won't be able to keep the medicine down." He shook his sleeves up and had the apprentice accompanying him open his medical chest. He then took out the kit of acupuncture needles and showed it to Gao Zhongxiong, who was standing at the side, "I'll use a few acupuncture needles on him."

Kong Ling stood up and said, "No hurry. Wait for the Second Master to come over before making a decision."

The physician spread his hands and said, "Saving a life is like putting out a fire. It cannot be delayed. How about this? You gentlemen hurry up and send someone to urge the Second Master over. Meanwhile, I'll get everything ready."

Gao Zhongxiong repeatedly voiced his agreement and made his way out. But when he walked to the door, he found Li Xiong blocking the doorway.

The physician turned his back to them and lifted a portion of the hanging screen to walk into the inner chamber, at the same time still instructing the apprentice, "Lift the chest in—"

Fei Sheng sensed something the instant the apprentice collected the kit of acupuncture needles. He suddenly grasped hold of the hilt of his blade and bellowed, "Hold it!"

However, the apprentice instantly swung his hand, and cold glints from inside the kit flashed. Fei Sheng could dodge, but not the gentlemen, so he could only draw his blade to block the blow. Under a series of clinking and clanking sounds as the concealed weapon struck against his blade, he bumped Kong Ling away.

The table and chairs in the outer room overturned with a clatter. Kong Ling lost his balance, and as he fell onto the rug, he stretched out his hands and shouted with urgency, "Men! Come quick!"

The physician had already leaped into the inner room. The bamboo blinds fell with a swoosh, blocking everyone's line of sight. Fei Sheng was so alarmed he broke out in a cold sweat. He had only just taken a stride out when the apprentice swung a chair and blocked him.

Oh, no!

Fei Sheng cried out, "Protect His Lordship!"

It was too late for the guards in the hallway to break in through the windows. All of a sudden, Gao Zhongxiong was knocked over to the ground. Moving swiftly as if on winged feet, Li Xiong yelled as he charged into the inner room and lunged at the physician, knocking him over to the ground. Both of them crashed into the footrest before the bed, sending the lowered bed curtains fluttering. The steel needles clamped between the physician's fingers aimed right for Li Xiong's eyes. Li Xiong reached out to grasp hold of the physician's hand and slammed his own head into the physician's head, sending it slamming back onto the ground.

The knock made the physician's head swim with dizziness. He backhandedly wrapped his arms around Li Xiong's neck and twisted around to flip Li Xiong over to the ground, holding him in a chokehold. As they tumbled, they bumped over the short table in the inner room. The teapot toppled over and shattered, and scalding hot tea splashed all over Li Xiong's face. Gasping hard for breath, Li Xiong swung a fist at the other man's face, but he struck at empty air.

The physician held down Li Xiong. The side of Li Xiong's face chafed against the broken porcelain fragments, stabbing him until it was all streaked with blood. He shouted, "Lizard! Lizard!"<sup>16</sup>

The physician lifted his steel needle, but unexpectedly, he felt a sudden weight to his back, and his entire person went crashing over to the ground where he tumbled. Covering half of his face, he said something at the top of his voice in the Biansha tongue and swiftly went groping for the steel needle that had dropped. Xiao Chiye abruptly hauled up the Lizard by the back of his collar and slammed him face-down to the ground.

Those in the outer chamber heard a few muffled "thuds", then all was silent within.

The guards held down the apprentice. Fei Sheng had not even caught his breath when the bamboo blinds swung wildly from being bumped into. The physician with his entire head all bloodied rolled onto the rug in the outer room, already devoid of life.

Xiao Chiye's expression was icy and piercing. He forcibly suppressed his fury and said in a frosty tone, "Seal the place from the courtyard to the main gate with one person every ten steps. Who screened them? Scram without needing me to tell you to!"

Everyone within and outside of the courtyard fell to their knees.

To think an entire residence of guards could let the other party openly enter the inner room. Fei Sheng's cold sweat never once stopped. He kowtowed, knocking his head on the ground, not daring to even utter a sound.

CHAPTER 253: SICK FROM THE COLD

Once the hour of chen came around, the atmosphere in the city of Duanzhou underwent an abrupt change. Soldiers filled the streets and alleys, while the garrison troops and the Imperial Army took turns to patrol. The four gates remained tightly shut. Everywhere, the clicking sound of military boots and the clanking sound of blades abounded. The atmosphere in the residence was heavy. All the guards were on high alert and ready for combat. They no longer dared to slacken even the slightest.

Xiao Chiye squatted before Li Xiong and asked, “You know him?”

Ointment was being applied to Li Xiong’s injured face as he answered, “Yeah. He’s a Lizard. They drink Gedale’s milk. Very stinky.”

Xiao Chiye frowned. “Not a Scorpion?”

“Used, used to be a Scorpion.” Li Xiong spoke in such a hurry that he stumbled over his words a little. “But later, he became a ‘lizard’.”<sup>17</sup>

Ding Tao could not make head or tail of it. “What do you mean by he used to be but not later?”

“They are the Lizards.” Li Xiong patted his own arm. “My big bro spoke to them before. They are not the same as Hai, Hai...” He could not remember Hairigu’s name. “Not the same as Hai. They are not cattle and sheep.”

In the eyes of the Twelve Tribes, the Scorpions were the cattle and sheep of Gedale. Their status was low and humble.

Xiao Chiye remembered Zhuoli. Zhuoli was a Lizard too, but Zhuoli had clear Biansha characteristics, so it seemed that a Lizard was still a Scorpion, only that they had a change of name.

“Lizards.” Xiao Chiye looked up at Li Xiong and guessed, “The Lizards are Amu’er’s Scorpions. That’s why they have a higher status than Achi and Hairigu.”

Li Xiong gave him a thumbs up and said happily, “Right. They have lands, where they can ride horses.” As he spoke, he sulked again. “They are all super bad people who love beating others, and they don’t play with the Scorpions. They are more valuable than the Scorpions.”

Xiao Chiye pressed against his thumb ring and rotated it gently.

Hasen had not even died for three days, and already Amu’er’s Lizards had appeared in the courtyard. Did they come along with Zhuoli’s squad? Or were they originally here to begin with?

“You did well.” Xiao Chiye raised a hand and patted Li Xiong on the head. “Keep watch over His Lordship here. Second Master will give you sweets.”

“You’ve always been meticulous when it comes to this kind of matter.” Qiao Tianya’s hair was not even thoroughly dry when he arrived at the prison. “How could you make such an oversight today?”

Fei Sheng, who was scrutinizing the corpse, shook his head on hearing him. “The assassins had Dazhou faces, and they spoke the local language even more smoothly than you and I do.” He turned his head to the side. “They even had proof of household registration.”

Qiao Tianya turned the corpse to look it over.

Shen Zechuan established the Zhongbo census register,<sup>18</sup> so every family’s and every household’s records could be traced and checked. If these assassins even had household registrations, that meant that they had very likely laid in ambush in Zhongbo even earlier than Shen Zechuan.

“This makes it a tough one to handle,” Qiao Tianya said in a quiet voice. “There’s no way to tell them apart if they are hiding among the people.”

“If we were to speak of flaws, there’s only one.” Fei Sheng pointed at the corpse’s arm.

“Tattoo.”

Qiao Tianya’s gaze shifted down. Sure enough, he saw a lizard tattoo on the side of the corpse’s arm.

“Back then, to investigate the Scorpions, Master had the various yamen record down the names of those who had tattoos.” Fei Sheng folded his arms. "I've already sent a letter to Yu Xiaozai in Dunzhou. If there are no records of these two men's names, then they snuck their way in when the city was breached."

Qiao Tianya nodded. As he retracted his hand, he looked at Fei Sheng. There was no smile on his face as he said, "Have you ever considered why they would have such obvious marks on them despite being assassins who sneaked their way in?"

They were all Imperial Bodyguards, and they knew very well the necessity of disguise and camouflage. The Scorpions had a reason for having tattoos, but what need was there for the Lizards, who were of even higher status than the Scorpions?

The expression in Fei Sheng's eyes was grave as he lightly clicked his tongue.

"Tsk."

Shen Zechuan woke up once at the hour of shen, and Xiao Chiye fed him the medicine. Shen Zechuan was so feverish he was in a daze. He could hear Xiao Chiye talking, but Xiao Chiye's voice kept fading in and out.

"Lanzhou..." Xiao Chiye said something as he brushed aside the hair by Shen Zechuan's cheek.

Shen Zechuan gasped lightly as if he could not breathe. Taking the spoon into his mouth, he swallowed the last mouthful of medicine. Xiao Chiye wiped Shen Zechuan's sweat with a soaked handkerchief. He tilted his head, and the tip of his nose rubbed against Xiao Chiye's bandaged palm. His lips opened and closed.

Xiao Chiye lowered his head to listen.

"Handkerchief." Shen Zechuan's words were all over the place. "Mine."

"It's with me." Xiao Chiye covered Shen Zechuan's soaked palm with his free hand. "Once you recover, I'll give it to you."

Shen Zechuan was so ill he was barely conscious. In his pain, he indistinctly whimpered twice.

Xiao Chiye's entire person leaned over on his stomach beside the pillow and coaxed him, "I'll really give it to you."

Shen Zechuan did not believe him. He frowned, as if he was struggling, his partially closed eyes betraying just how sad he was as he buried them into Xiao Chiye's palm. It was in this way he tugged at Xiao Chiye's heartstrings. Xiao Chiye lowered his head and pressed up against Shen Zechuan's temple, against his sweat.

The taste of bitterness saturated the tip of Shen Zechuan's tongue. All his half-opened eyes saw was a mosaic of bizarre, surreal scenes. Only Xiao Chiye's scent surrounded him, making him seem to float among the waves of grass.

In a very, very small voice, he called out, "Xiao'er."

Xiao Chiye kissed him and answered with a deep nasal twang, "Mm."

Shen Zechuan frowned several times and said with his voice breaking up, "I want to... eat sweets..."

Xiao Chiye's heart that had been on tenterhooks relaxed some. He got up to mix him some honeyed water. Shen Zechuan only drank two spoonfuls of it, only needing the tip of his tongue to get a taste of the sweetness. Once again, Xiao Chiye rinsed the handkerchief and wiped down the sweat on Shen Zechuan's neck. From the feel of it, his fever seemed to have subsided some.

The gentlemen in the side hall were all restless with anxiety. The suffocating smell of smoking pipes permeated the room, and no one made to get up even when the hour of hai came around. They had even forgotten about their meals, as concerned as they were about the prefectural lord.

"All these physicians are useless," Tantai Hu sat on the chair and said to Kong Ling. "Look, Mister, what if I immediately headed out of the city on my horse and search again in Dunzhou?"

Gao Zhongxiong's face paled at the mere mention of this. He hurriedly waved his hands. "That won't do. The assassins today had clear origins that could stand up to scrutiny. If there really are spies, no one will be able to tell them apart!"

Kong Ling's frown did not let up.

The entire room of people fell silent once again. Not long after, they heard the sound of rain falling again outside. The guards braved the rain and took turns to be on duty. Lanterns that had been lit up late in the night brightly illuminated the various paths within the residence, leaving no blind spots for anyone to take advantage of.

Everyone did not get to rest much after the battle, and by the time the hour of chou had come and gone, those with weaker constitutions could no longer take it. They reclined against the chairs to doze off, drifting between nodding off and staying awake because they did not dare to sleep, and so it was in this way they hung in there.

Yao Wenyu took off his fur collar when he entered the room. The sound of the wheelchair startled quite a number of people awake. He placed the fur collar on his lap and said in a mild tone, "Second Master is here, so His Lordship is certain to be fine. I know that all of you here are burning with anxiety, but now the battle has just stopped, the documents from the yamen of the various prefectures are piling up. It would be inappropriate to wait until His Lordship wakes up to deal with them. It's enough for Chengfeng and Shenwei to keep watch here. The rest of you can go back and rest first. Tomorrow morning, all matters are to be handled normally. Act at your own discretion for trivial matters, whereas for major affairs you are uncertain about, present them to the side hall, and we will discuss and come to a resolution together."

Kong Ling also got to his feet and said, "His Lordship is presently ill. It is indeed inadvisable for us to pile him with pressing work. Everyone, please head back first."

Everyone stood up and responded in the affirmative, then filed out of the room one after the other.

Gao Zhongxiong poured tea for Yao Wenyu and said, "Yuanzhuo is sensitive to the cold. You should ask someone to accompany you."

Yao Wenyu took the tea and said his thanks. "I have the fur collar and overcoat, so it's fine. It has been raining non-stop these few days. I see that the drainage of the public ditches in the city is going along smoothly. There has been no incident."

"The beginning of the new year." Tantai Hu roused himself up and rubbed his eye with the blade scar. "Everyone was here at the beginning of the year, fearing that the melted snow would cause a blockage, so they went out of the way to dredge it once."

"The ones in Dengzhou are clogged, but it's not a big issue. His Excellency Yu watched them being dredged during his tour of inspection," Gao Zhongxiong said. "There have been plenty of updates coming in from Cizhou these two days. Other than the letter in which His Excellency Zhou asked after His Lordship, there are also those discussing the Eight Cities."

The properties of the Pan clan had been confiscated, and the city of Dancheng missed the spring plowing. This was already the sixth month.

Once the autumn harvest that was just around the corner came calling, the meals of the commoners of Dancheng would be a matter of worry.

“We are fighting a battle here, and so is Qudu,” Kong Ling said. “I heard the news that the Grand Secretariat has already instructed the Ministry of Rites to begin preparation for the enthronement ceremony.”

Han Cheng was dead, and while Empress Dowager counted on her connection to Hua Xiangyi to preserve her life, she was completely imprisoned in the inner court where the harem resided. The authority to deploy the Eight Great Training Divisions of the Capital Command Troops returned into the Heir Apparent’s hands. Li Jianting had the Qidong Garrison Troops to act as surety too, so how could the noble clans who could not even fend for themselves stop her?

“We are besieged with external foes. If everyone works as one to assist His Lordship, Biansha will not pose a difficult problem. But Qudu of now is torn apart by disunity. Xue Yanqing’s confiscation and sealing off of the Pan clan’s properties has already caused the eight cities to stir with restlessness.” Yao Wenyu said in a soft voice, “The enthronement of the Heir Apparent will prove to come bearing down even more menacingly.”

“Speaking of which,” Kong Ling looked at Chen Yang, “we still don’t know what happened in the Bianjun Commandery. Has an agreement been reached with the Youxiong Tribe?”

Straightening out the military affairs, Chen Yang said, “Had that been the case, Second Master wouldn’t have been late. Dalantai of the Youxiong Tribe agreed to our request and promised not to obstruct Commander-in-chief Qi from moving north. He took Hasen’s thank-you gift and indeed kept his words not to obstruct Commander-in-chief Qi from mobilizing troops to Gedale, but he violated the oath of allegiance and mounted a surprise attack on the Bianjun Commandery just when Second Master was preparing to deploy troops to Duanzhou.”

Just as Qi Zhuyin predicted, Dalantai did not take sides with anyone. He did not want to submit to Amu’er at all, nor did he want to place himself at Shen Zechuan’s disposal. He saw his opportunity from Hasen’s and Shen Zechuan’s requests. He wanted to pass through the Bianjun Commandery to occupy Suotian Pass to the south, which had no other strong and capable general stationed there after their loss of Feng Yisheng.

The Youxiong Tribe lived on the grasslands in the south. When Dalantai roamed the desert, he came to understand that there was no room for the bears<sup>19</sup> there. They endured the rigors of an arduous journey, trekking through difficult terrains and rivers, to return to a place near their homeland, all to seek a new place to live. For this, they were willing to risk their lives and take up their blades to fight with everything they had.

It was on the yellow sands in the desert that Xiao Chiye's armored cavalry crossed paths with the "bear horses".<sup>20</sup>

The Bianjun Commandery fought for two days, and Dalantai died there in battle. The Youxiong Tribe seemed to be forever unable to cross over that threshold, and they could only, once again, retreat to the desert.

"The reinforcements Hasen left behind in Gedale were handed over to Commander-in-chief Qi." Chen Yang raised the military report in his hand. "And going by last night's urgent report, Commander-in-chief Qi found out on her return journey that Amu'er is in the midst of deploying his troops."

At these words, the entire hall promptly grew tense.

Gao Zhongxiong stammered, "Then, then, we are going to fight, fight again..."

Chen Yang gestured for him to relax. "It's just a transfer of troops. After all, the commanding general in the battle zone is gone. Amu'er has to send someone who can take over Hasen... I feel this person might very well be himself."

Because Xiao Chiye did not return Hasen's head.<sup>21</sup>

"The specific arrangements for military affairs will have to depend on Second Master's instructions." Tantai Hu reassured the various gentlemen. "No matter what, they won't fight their way to the base of the city anymore. At the moment, we have the upper hand. Even if Amu'er heads into battle himself, he might not necessarily be more formidable than Hasen. Besides, if he wants to cross the Chashi River, he has to ask Second Master for permission."

Only then did the atmosphere in the side hall ease off a little. As they were discussing, they suddenly heard a huge commotion in the hallway. Chen Yang lifted the hanging screen and poked his head out for a look.

Ding Tao cried so hard a snot bubble popped out of his nose. Tugging at Chen Yang, he shouted, "Ge! Call the physicians in quickly! His Lordship is burning up again!"

The physicians were trembling with trepidation as they gathered in the walkway and discussed the prescriptions in whispers. The rain washed down upon the jasmine orange in the courtyard, covering the ground all over with petals.

Qiao Tianya and Fei Sheng braved the rain as they returned, stepping across the flower petals before swiftly wiping the water off their bodies under the eaves.

“The physicians who saw Yuanzhuo before are all here,” Qiao Tianya threw the handkerchief back, “as are the physicians Ge Qingqing transferred over from Juexi, and not one of them can treat the illness?”

“This fever keeps relapsing.” Chen Yang did not dare to speak facing the window. He turned to the side and said in a whisper, “They said his constitution is a gone case. He’s just like porcelain. Few dare to prescribe medicine.”

“That’s what they said about Yuanzhuo the last time.” Qiao Tianya did not raise his voice at the physicians. After a moment’s pause, he continued, “It’s true that His Lordship ruined his body in his early years consuming that medication, but these days, he has been recuperating at home, so that shouldn’t be the case at all.”

“Master also wants to be cured deep down in his heart, and he has been taking his medicine on schedule.” Fei Sheng clutched the handkerchief he used to wipe away the water. He was worried sick. “... I suppose he must have been too badly injured that day.”

They were going to disperse the smell of medicine in the room, and no one wanted to provoke the Second Master at this moment, so they stood under the eaves and waited to be summoned. But within a few moments of the servant carrying the medicine entering, they heard Shen Zechuan vomiting.

Xiao Chiye, who was partially hugging Shen Zechuan, touched Shen Zechuan’s back, which was already soaked in sweat. The medicine was all spilled over the ground. Shen Zechuan could not throw up a thing, and after puking out bile, he dry-heaved. His stomach was in a twist at present, and his bouts of vomiting were so bad he retched himself awake.

Fog started to materialize in the middle of the night. Deathly white lantern lights swayed in the rain. The sound of footsteps in the courtyard never once stopped. Rain soaked the courtyard damp, and the bedding had already been changed once.

Fei Sheng apprehensively said, “Prepare a charcoal brazier and keep the fire going to dry it up a little.”

Chen Yang saw that the bandages being taken out were all soaked in blood. He did not know if it was Xiao Chiye's or Shen Zechuan's.

Li Xiong sat cross-legged by the door and slept for a while, waking up when the hour of yin came around. Fei Sheng had the kitchen give Li Xiong rice. Li Xiong buried his head in the large bowl and gobbled it down. Once he had eaten his fill, he continued to sit and stare at the people entering and exiting.

"Persuade the Second Master to sleep for a moment at the hour of mao." Qiao Tianya squatted beside the pillar and struck up a fire to light up his pipe. "Even someone forged in iron like him can't take it and just make do and sleep inside. Those of us who guard the door..."

He had yet to finish his words when a hand reached out from the side and gently nudged aside his smoking pipe.

Qiao Tianya turned back and looked at Yao Wenyu.

"It's rather suffocating." Yao Wenyu turned his wheelchair to face the principal room.

Willowy wisps of smoke spiraled, turning into the tiny bit of invisible tenderness in the dripping wet rainy night. With hands on knees, Qiao Tianya stood up and extinguished the smoking pipe.

It was all silent in the courtyard during the hour of mao. Night fell, and day broke again. The guards who had been successively taking the night watch were all wearing out, as passive as they were in their wait. Fei Sheng was leaning against the pillar with his eyes closed to catch a breather when his ears suddenly twitched. He opened his eyes, and it was a long while later when there was movement in the doorway.

"He's back." Fei Sheng quickly leaped down the steps. "Gu Jin is back!"

One of the lanterns under the eaves went out. Xiao Chiye heard activity, and after a moment, the hanging drapes lifted slightly.

"Second Master." Gu Jin, who had braved the elements and hardships the entire arduous journey, knelt on one knee in the outer room. "I'm back late! I was midway through my journey when I heard the Biansha Cavalry besieged the city of Duanzhou. Even when I rushed through the bridgeway, I couldn't make it in time."

Xiao Chiye suddenly jolted to his feet and came out of the inner chamber. The few people under the eaves listened with bated breath and rapt attention.

Without wiping the rainwater off his face, Gu Jin met Xiao Chiye's gaze and, not daring to hesitate, reported, "Second Master, the Venerable Master... is indeed dead."

CHAPTER 254: JIRAN

Raindrops pelted the fallen flowers into the mud, then pounded its fragile petals to pieces. The wind swept across the bamboo blinds, causing the scene inside the room to flutter slightly, making it hard to get a clear look within.

“I went to Hezhou and found the Venerable Master’s layman family. They confirmed that after the Venerable Master returned to Hezhou, he was taken away by the Yan clan under the pretext of consulting for an illness.” Gu Jin changed his tone. “But heaven never leaves one in the lurch. Jiran!”

The hearts of the guards at the door all leaped to their mouth at this one word of “Jiran” from Gu Jin, but then, he did not continue.

Jiran? Since what?<sup>22</sup>

Li Xiong was in the midst of picking up the candied fruit in the jar to eat when he suddenly saw a smooth egg popping out from the end of the walkway. All wrapped up in a large and roomy monk cassock, that egg lifted two long trails of sleeves and trotted over. As he passed by Li Xiong, he did not forget to cast a glance at the candied fruits, and with this one look, he did not pay attention to where he was going and tripped over himself and fell into the bamboo blinds with a “thud”.

“Oops!” The sprawling egg lifted his head and said, “Greetings to Second Master!”

The crowd fixed their eyes on him—turned out he was a fourteen or fifteen years old monk, even younger than Ding Tao. Dragging his sleeves, the little monk put his palms together and recited with a solemn and respectful expression, “Amitabha!”

He had a Hezhou accent and could not pronounce the “mi” clearly, so it sounded like “anitabha”.

“Second Master,” Gu Jin said. “It was precisely for this lad that the Venerable Master had been willing to return to Hezhou.”

“Uh-huh, uh-huh.” Jiran nodded his head as though that was indeed the case. “It’s precisely for this humble monk.”

“The Venerable Master was getting up in the years, and was well aware that he did not have much time left before he would soon leave this world. But Jiran was too young, so the Venerable Master headed back to Hezhou and placed him under the care of his distant layman relatives. Unexpectedly, it was at that time he crossed paths with the Yan Clan there.”

“Young Master Yan said that he wanted to bring this humble monk out to play,” Blinking his clear and round eyes, Jiran continued, “This humble monk had to fetch the water. He got impatient waiting and invited Master away first.”

Xiao Chiye noted Jiran’s young age, and his remaining hope that had just been ignited was thoroughly extinguished.

Gu Jin seemed to read what Xiao Chiye was thinking and continued. “Even though Jiran is young, he has acquired the Venerable Master’s legacy, and his medical skills are consummate. With him consulting for the Prefectural Lord, Second Master...”

“Eh, eh,” Jiran shook his head hard. “No way. How can the light from a firefly even begin to compare with the brilliance of the moon? This humble monk and shifu are like the small creek and boundless ocean—there’s no comparison!”

He still had baby fat on his face. Not only did he look innocent, but even his words had an air of naivety.

Li Xiong forgot to eat his candied fruit as he tilted his head out from the side of the door with Ding Tao to size up this soft-boiled egg.

Gu Jin lifted Jiran up by his back collar and said. “Go take a look first!”

Jiran took Shen Zechuan’s pulse, frowning at times and mumbling to himself at times.

Xiao Chiye lowered his voice to ask, “How is he?”

Jiran lowered his gaze to look at Shen Zechuan’s wrist. After a long time, he replied to Xiao Chiye, “His Lordship really is fair.”

There was no trace of probing on Jiran's fair, tender face. His compliment of Shen Zechuan with those bright, clear eyes of his was just as natural as if he was complimenting a clear spring or a white cloud. Xiao Chiye's terrifying possessiveness found no footing on which to flare.

"His Lordship's body is weak due to the adverse effect of the medication he was consuming, but fortunately, he has been meticulously nursed these past six months, and his primordial qi<sup>23</sup> still remains." Jiran rolled up his sleeves, holding onto his brush as he thought long and hard before writing a prescription down onto the white sheet of paper.

Xiao Chiye dared not to rest assured just yet, and continued to probe. "He just needs to continue with the prescription?"

"Of course not. External injuries are still injuries, no less. His waist was even stabbed. If His Lordship happens to fall into a coma or stop breathing temporarily tonight, Second Master doesn't have to fret." Jiran regretfully continued. "This humble monk must advise the Second Master not to allow His Lordship to use martial arts again in the future. His Lordship's body is simply not suited to use such a forceful and hard-hitting boxing style. He throws a punch out—yes, the other person will hurt, but His Lordship will feel the pain too. It's so not worth it. After he gets through these two nights and his fever subsides, he will have to convalesce for quite several years."

Jiran handed the prescription over to Xiao Chiye.

"It is best that His Lordship writes with his left hand these six months."

Jiran took the opportunity to look at Xiao Chiye's palm. He said, "Even though Second Master is fit and healthy, you have to remember to rest as well. This injury must not be soaked in water."

Xiao Chiye asked, "How long is 'several years'?"

Jiran rubbed his head. "I'm not sure myself... but you can't go wrong with convalescing."

Xiao Chiye tightened his grip on the prescription and looked towards the lowered drapes. Shen Zechuan's breathing was even as he lay unconscious. His extended wrist exposed in the slightly dimmed room was just as fair as Jiran had said, so fair that it seemed as though he would melt at a single touch.

In his drowsy state, Shen Zechuan had a dream. He dreamed he stood before the gate of Qudu at age fifteen, waiting for his shifu, shiniang, and Ji Mu to take him home. Dressed in the short padded coat Hua Pingting made, he watched the fine snow stream down along the city walls.

Ji Mu leaned over the top of the wall and shouted at him. "Chuan-er, where are you going?"

Grasping his new coat, Shen Zechuan said in a daze, "I'm going home."

Ji Mu raised his head and gazed in the direction of Duanzhou together with him. "Then wait for a little longer. Father is about to come."

Shen Zechuan could not remember why he had to stand here. He waited from dawn till dusk, and even though it was snowing, he felt very warm.

Ji Mu rubbed his arms and asked, "Ge is a little cold. Want to come up to warm yourself by the fire?"

Shen Zechuan shook his head. "I feel very warm."

And so Ji Mu started a fire at the top of the city wall. He extended both his hands out for warmth as he chatted with Shen Zechuan. "When we go back this time, Ge will be able to get married. Mother has been nagging about it for years."

They waited for a very long time. Shen Zechuan's waist was aching, as were his calves. Every part of him hurt. He wiped his sweat, looking into the horizon ahead throughout.

Seeing as the sky had darkened, Ji Mu suddenly murmured, "Father isn't coming anymore." His fire burned out. He got up to put on the military coat set at the side and leaned over the top of the wall to flash a grin at Shen Zechuan. "Chuan-er."

Shen Zechuan raised his head and took a few steps, looking at him.

Ji Mu said, "Ge's whistle call is sounding. I can't wait anymore. I have to go."

Shen Zechuan nodded, already accustomed to it. "Then go. I'll tell shiniang." <sup>24</sup>

Ji Mu revealed a troubled expression, as if he was having a headache, and said with a sigh, "Ge's worried. You..."

"I'll walk back from here." Shen Zechuan raised a finger and pointed into the distance. "It's nearby."

Ji Mu looked at Shen Zechuan, the expression in his eyes gentle. "What am I to do about my little brother?"

Shen Zechuan heard the sound of hooves and leaped a little as he yelled, "Ge, shifu is here!"

Ji Mu said nothing and merely remained that way with his head propped in his hands as he smiled.

Shen Zechuan turned his head and saw a gyrfalcon with its wings spread flying out from the horizon, followed by a galloping horse that was black all over with a patch of white on its front chest.

He stopped in his tracks and watched that horse running over to him.

Sitting on the back of the horse was a youth wearing a helmet. The gyrfalcon landed on his shoulder. He removed his helmet, revealing his rather displeased face, and bent over to scrutinize Shen Zechuan. "What are you standing there for? Get on the horse. Second Young Master will take you away."

Shen Zechuan ignored him, so he dismounted his horse, knocked his helmet on Shen Zechuan's head, and hoisted up Shen Zechuan.

"Ah," Shen Zechuan said, smothered in the helmet. "I want to go home."

Xiao Chiye flicked a finger at Shen Zechuan, unreasonably impervious to reason. "You're leaving with me."

He walked a few steps, then asked, as if angry, "Don't you recognize me?"

"I don't," Shen Zechuan answered.

Xiao Chiye made to toss Shen Zechuan into the snow. He threw Shen Zechuan up, and when Shen Zechuan panicked, caught him again with steady hands. The gyrfalcon landed on his shoulder, and he burst out laughing as he looked at Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan lifted the helmet and looked at him, baffled.

The originally darkening sky abruptly lit up. Wind tousled Xiao Chiye's hair, and the surrounding wall that blocked his line of sight all disappeared to reveal a boundless expanse of grassland paved beneath his feet. It was in this way he hugged Shen Zechuan and greedily stroked Shen Zechuan's cheek.

"I want to hide you away," Xiao Chiye said aloud in the wind, "or perhaps put you into the pocket in my bosom."

Shen Zechuan could not hear him clearly. He tilted his head up and asked, "What did you say?"

Xiao Chiye looked at him and kissed him hard on the cheek.

"I said you're really good-looking," he answered. "Too damn good-looking. No one will ever surpass you in looks, I swear!"

Shen Zechuan covered his cheek and replied loudly, "You're lying!"

Paying no heed to his struggle, Xiao Chiye hugged him tight and said in his ear, "My bad."

The wind stopped, and Xiao Chiye swiftly grew up. His broad shoulders blocked out the light as he embraced Shen Zechuan, looking as if he had just woken up, and at the same time, still in dreamland. His unraveled hair weaved together with Shen Zechuan's, spreading out among the bedding. A tiny little braid lay across in the middle.

Shen Zechuan opened his bleary eyes and zoned out for a while. Tiredly, he said, "It's all bound together."

"Mm." Xiao Chiye lifted the little braid with his long finger. "As they say, they who bind their hair together become husband and wife."<sup>25</sup>

Shen Zechuan had only just woken up and he was still coming around and getting his bearings.

Xiao Chiye rubbed his back for him and said, "Time to get up."

He rubbed Shen Zechuan until Shen Zechuan turned slightly aside and was now lying on Xiao Chiye's chest. Xiao Chiye had calluses on his hands, and his rubs felt very comfortable. Shen Zechuan's eyes were almost about to narrow. Still, he did not forget to say angrily to Xiao Chiye, "You're so noisy."

Xiao Chiye nuzzled him hard with his stubbled chin and said, "You're going to be the death of me, Shen Lanzhou."

Shen Zechuan poked Xiao Chiye's cheek with his right hand that had been wrapped into a dumpling. Very naturally, both of them shared a tired, listless kiss.

The spell of rain over several days came to a cease, and sunny days took over in Duanzhou.

Jiran might have been a very modest one, but three days later, Shen Zechuan was able to consume congee on schedule. The little monk stood by the window, piously reciting "anitabha". When Xiao Chiye asked what he wanted as a reward, he pointed to Li Xiong's candy jar without hesitation.

Everyone heaved a sigh of relief and handed the candy jar over to him before Li Xiong could protest.

The window in the room was opened. Shen Zechuan rested against the back cushion and listened to Fei Sheng finish his report.

“If they were spies, there was indeed no need for them to leave such obvious tattoos on their bodies.” Shen Zechuan held the report Yuanzhuo wrote in his left hand. It covered all the important matters these few days which the advisers were in no position to take the decision into their own hands. “You mean, the reason they still had the lizard tattoo on them was to distinguish themselves from the ordinary Scorpions?”

“The Lizards all belonged under Amu’er, and they pride themselves on being a branch of the Hanshe Tribe,” Qiao Tianya said. “Zhuoli has to step onto the battlefield, so it’s not surprising for him to have the tattoo, but the only possibility for infiltrating Lizards to still have their tattoos could only be that they are worried about getting confused by others.”

“What did Youjing say?” Xiao Chiye asked.

“The household registrations the assassins used are legitimate. There are indeed these two people in Fanzhou, but it’s very likely that they have been replaced,” Fei Sheng said. “After all, we only know their names, but not their appearances.”

“That can’t be helped,” Kong Ling said in a steady voice. “The census register has to be filled in and reported every year. Even if the various prefectural yamen take down their portraits during the verification process, they can’t be kept for long.”

But Qiao Tianya was right in his conjecture. Why did the infiltrating Lizards need to have tattoos on them? That way, there would be no escape for them once they were found out. Amu’er treated them as his own private soldiers. Even Zhuoli was “loaned” to Hasen, which showed just how highly Amu’er regarded these Lizards. If it was really to differentiate themselves from the Scorpions, then it had to do with the Scorpions who roamed Zhongbo’s territories all year round.

“Duanzhou isn’t close to Gedale, and it’s even further away from Amu’er. Even the fastest horses can’t get the news there instantly.” Xiao Chiye knew the military map to the east like the back of his hand. “Even Hasen’s saker falcons didn’t manage to fly back. These two Lizards were not sent by Amu’er.”

Amu’er’s deployment of troops was his contingency plan for the worst-case scenario where Qi Zhuyin attacked Gedale and Hasen did not return to provide reinforcements. His confirmation of Hasen’s death could only happen within these two days. This was because the Chashi River was not easy to cross, so he had no way of giving orders to the Lizards a few days prior. There was simply no time.

Understanding flashed across Yao Wenyu's expression. "Since the Lizards are Amu'er's private soldiers, they would not easily heed the deployment commands of another person. If Amu'er was not the one who gave them the order to assassinate, then the only possibility left is that someone gave them the orders under Amu'er's name."

Fei Sheng furrowed his brows. "If so, that means there is still a Scorpion or a Lizard by our side, and he knows the movements in Duanzhou."

Always the one who would immediately get nervous, Gao Zhongxiong said, "Then isn't that terrible? This person is very familiar with matters concerning Zhongbo!"

"If these Lizards were long-time residents in the territory, then even if they had proof of household registration, they would also have been recorded down in the book due to their tattoo," Qiao Tianya said, "which means they have only just sneaked their way in."

"The yamen's checks are so strict," Kong Ling said. "It's too hard for them to sneak into the city unnoticed. They have to be able to evade the guards' inspections."

"Then there's really a place where they can do that." Chen Yang bowed slightly to the Prefectural Lord. "The Scorpions of Cizhou are not subjected to questioning within the territory. They can move freely following Hairigu."

Hairigu's Scorpions originally could only remain at the Beiyuan Hunting Grounds under the strict watch of the garrison troops. It was only until they rendered meritorious services at the Chashi Sinkhole accompanying the Libei Armored Cavalry that Zhongbo undid their shackles. If the Lizards were with him, then the issue about the tattoo would make sense.

Fei Sheng promptly said, "Hairigu's negotiation with the Youxiong Tribe did not work out too. Master, why not I..."

"What's the hurry? With the Youxiong Tribe retreating in defeat, the Qingshu Tribe's territory has been completely vacated." Shen Zechuan set down the report and said to Xiao Chiye, "Let's give this piece of land to Hairigu."

Xiao Chiye lifted his brows slightly.

“Hairigu signed an oath of alliance with the Youxiong Tribe on my behalf, but the Youxiong Tribe reneged on the agreement.” An undercurrent of ruthlessness coursed through Shen Zechuan’s tired eyes. “There is a price to be paid for betrayal. Let Hairigu collect this debt on my behalf.”

The reason Hairigu wanted to instigate the Lizards hiding in his own nest of Scorpions was to ignite the flames of war as soon as possible. He wanted lands, and just like Dalantai, they all seemed to be wavering, but in truth, they were all working for their own benefits.

Xiao Chiye killed Achi over at the Chashi Sinkhole, so the Biansha Scorpions were now without a leader, and Hairigu had no more rival to vie with him. If he returned to the desert at this time, he would be the one and only leader of the remaining Scorpions. He even dared to do Yan Heru’s business, so he could also turn around and work with Amu’er again owing to the change in the situation.

If Shen Zechuan killed off Hairigu, he would merely be killing off an exposed Scorpion. Amu’er had no lack of this kind of Scorpions, so Shen Zechuan would not only spare Hairigu but also give Hairigu the land he yearned for so much. He wanted Hairigu to stand here and firmly occupy the Zhongbo battlefield, controlling the flow of Scorpions, thereby becoming the thorn in Amu’er’s side.

But at the same time, Shen Zechuan also wanted to teach Hairigu a hard lesson.

If Hairigu wanted that piece of Qingshu Tribe’s land, he had to first go and deal with the Youxiong Tribe. As long as he did so, the Twelve Tribes would no longer accept him easily, and Amu’er would no longer trust him. He would also have to shoulder the Youxiong’s Tribe’s hatred, for he was the blade-wielding executioner who carried out the punishment.

The Prefectural Lord wanted to use his resources to the fullest.

Shen Zechuan grew tired from sitting, and as the others were about to retreat, he said, “There’s no hurry for Yuanzhuo to retire for a rest upon heading back. Jiran will be going over in a while to take a look at you.”

Jiran was still a child at heart, jumping across water puddles as he followed after Gu Jin. Seeing his smooth, bald head reflected in the water, he could not help but double up with laughter.

Qiao Tianya met them at the entrance. Putting his palms together too, he said to Jiran, “Little Master,<sup>26</sup> please enter.”

Jiran returned the greeting. At this time, the birds were chirping among the trees, and the weather was pleasantly warm. Dressed in monk robes, he stood in the water puddles of varying sizes that reflected the blue sky and white clouds, a sight that so entranced one it was hard to distinguish between heaven and earth.

“Benefactor,”<sup>27</sup> Jiran imitated his shifu’s<sup>28</sup> example and nodded slowly to Qiao Tianya. “You have an affinity with Buddha.”

Qiao Tianya found it interesting and said, “When I was young, there was a monk who said the same thing to me too. But then, to date, I still have yet to renounce the world and become a monk.”

Jiran looked at Qiao Tianya. When he was quiet, he had a kind of otherworldly aura. However, that was not the so-called detachment far removed from the mundane world, but a natural transcendence. Such was the little monk, pure and untainted, observing the secular world with his own pair of eyes.

“Worryfree are the clear waters, that creased in a frown because of the wind; Ageless are the emerald hills, that sport a crown of white because of the snow.<sup>29</sup> Benefactor’s ‘cause’ already exists, so would the ‘catalyst’ still be far along?”<sup>30</sup> The refreshing breeze blew up Jiran’s monk robe, and the hem of his clothes drooped into the water. He clapped his palms gently, looking in all seriousness in his naivety, as if already certain of Qiao Tianya’s future path.

Qiao Tianya heard the wind chimes under the eaves swaying in the breeze. He turned his head and saw Yao Wenyu sitting there. Yao Wenyu’s sleeves instantly swayed with the wind. Unexpectedly enough, he gave off the same vibe as Jiran strolling among the white clouds in the water puddles.

Jiran walked to the front of the steps, but did not bow to Yao Wenyu. Under the tinkling of the wind chimes, he scrutinized Yao Wenyu. Eventually, he shook his head. “I can’t heal your legs. Even if my shifu were alive, he wouldn’t be able to heal your legs either.”

Yao Wenyu covered Hunu on his lap with his fingers. “All conditioned phenomena are like a dream, an illusion, a bubble, a shadow, like the dew and a flash of lightning. And thus, it is so we shall perceive them.”<sup>31</sup>

The confluence of causes and conditions of this world was in a constant flux of change. Yao Wenyu was no longer obsessing over this pair of legs. Long when he answered, “I’m still standing”,<sup>32</sup> he had already extricated himself from it all. It made no difference whether he stood or sat. He was still himself. He was him.

Jiran sighed. “Others want me to speak of the sayings of Buddha, yet you speak of them to me. Existing in the existential view of your own mortality,<sup>33</sup> you’ve seen the end, so why stop and linger here? Come with me to the mountains.”

Yao Wenyu said, “I still have the forms of all things<sup>34</sup> in my heart.”

Looking at Yao Wenyu, Jiran raised a finger to point at Qiao Tianya. “You also have the form of him in your heart.”

The wind blew against Yao Wenyu’s sleeves, and the red thread on his wrist slid gently. He said, “That is why I’m still an ordinary mortal.”

The chain of cause and effect, of predestined relationships, was beyond intriguing. When exactly were its wheels set into motion? Perhaps it was that night when the red thread was bound, or perhaps it was that one utterance of “I hate you to the core”<sup>35</sup>, or perhaps even earlier, during the third month when spring was budding in the air.

Qiao Tianya, Qiao Songyue—he was the swallow that left his mark.

Yao Wenyu understood that all that existed in the world was but mere illusions. Everything he did today was like the snap of the finger that would swiftly vanish into the long, never-ending river.

Yao Wenyu, Yao Yuanzhuo—he was the leaf that turned to mud.

“I have nothing to give to you.” Jiran tilted his head slightly.

Yao Wenyu looked at Shen Zechuan’s courtyard and smiled. “You have already given me what I want.”

The yellow sand of the Bianjun Commandery brushed past the military banner, sending it fluttering. Qi Zhuyin removed her helmet. Her mouth was all mixed with gravel and grit. Qi Wei handed her a handkerchief. She could not strip off her armor and wipe herself down as the male generals did, so she could only bear the scorching heat and wipe her face with restraint.

“Duanzhou has sent several military reports,” Qi Wei said. “The report from the battle zone is here too.”

“The one from the battle zone is from Lu Guangbai. What else can it be but the retreat of the Biansha Cavalry soldiers?” Qi Zhuyin set down Zhujiu and moved behind the wall to cool off. “Duanzhou is from Xiao Chiye. Go ahead and read it out.”

Only then did Qi Wei open the private letter and read it out to Qi Zhuyin.

Qi Zhuyin's hands, which had initially been folding the handkerchief, paused. She looked at Qi Wei and repeated, "Give the Qingshu Tribe's territory to the Scorpions?"

Qi Wei carefully looked it over again and ensured there was no mistake before he nodded.

That bit of nonchalance Qi Zhuyin had gradually ebbed away. The armor on her shoulders was already considered light, but wear it for a long time, and it would still be heavy enough to make the shoulders sore.

"Get a brush," she said, "and reply to Xiao Chiye now. I do not agree."

The Qingshu Tribe was taken down and captured by the Qidong Garrison Troops. Qi Zhuyin had no use for this place, so she could give it to Libei or Zhongbo, but she had no wish to hand it over to the Scorpions. What did Hairigu's occupation of the Qingshu Tribe's territory imply? It implied that there would be the Scorpions keeping watch at her door from then on, one who could turn around and bite them back anytime.

It was exactly as Xiao Chiye expected when he received Qi Zhuyin's reply. He pillowed his head on his arms and said to Shen Zechuan beside him, "Qidong's terrains are what give it an advantage. Expanding eastward would weaken the importance of the Bianjun Commandery. The two 'door shutters' that are Tianfei Watchtower and Suotian Pass would also lose their purpose. It's tough to get Commander-in-chief Qi's nod regarding this matter."

Shen Zechuan was already about to fall asleep. "Libei is willing to establish a relationship of subordination with the Huiyan Tribe, and the Armored Cavalry subsequently receives the perks tea brought them. To Qidong, the advantage of increasing the territory outward from the Bianjun Commandery will far outweigh the disadvantages. It will also reduce the burden of military expenses placed on Commander-in-chief Qi in the future."

More than half of the tea the traveling merchants sold at the harbor from the mutual trade market came from the Huiyan Tribe. Shen Zechuan gave all this sum of money back to the Libei Armored Cavalry. It had to be known that the speed at which the Armored Cavalry depleted their equipment could be said to be ranked first in the world.

Thinking to this point, Shen Zechuan's drowsiness eased. He could not turn over as he pleased, so all he could do was to lean back like Xiao Chiye was doing as he continued, "The war can last a lifetime, then what about the next life?"

"Next life." Xiao Chiye covered his face with the letter and sighed. "I'd still want to be born in Libei."

As both of them lay, Ding Tao and Li Xiong smashed walnuts in the walkway with Jiran, the boys laughing merrily as they did so. Insects chirped up a ruckus under the blazing sun, one sound after another.

"Amu'er spent his whole life attempting in vain to unify the Twelve Tribes," after a while, Xiao Chiye said. "My father thought he could become the great ruler."

"You don't understand the reason Amu'er didn't become the great ruler of the desert." Shen Zechuan turned his head to the side. "I can tell you on the sly."

Xiao Chiye took away the letter and turned aside. It was so warm he was feeling lazy.

All he said was, "Hm?"

"Because Libei has Xiao Ce'an." Shen Zechuan raised his eyes and gazed at him. "You want to cross the river and advance eastward to go looking for Amu'er."

Xiao Chiye suddenly covered Shen Zechuan's eyes. The weather was so, so hot. He inched closer and whispered back, "My wife does understand me so."

The corners of Shen Zechuan's lips curved up slightly with a little smugness.

Xiao Chiye loved looking at Shen Zechuan this way. Lowering his eyes, he could not help but kiss him.

CHAPTER 255: QINGSHAN

The gardens in Qudu were all a lush shade of emerald green. Potted plants decorated both sides of Mingli Hall's open space. The eunuchs carried basins filled to the brim with ice pieces and placed them in all corners of the hall to dispel the heat. Meanwhile, the court officials under the eaves waiting for themselves to be summoned were all so hot they were sweating, yet they could not breach decorum, and so could only force themselves to endure it and let their sweat soak through their robes.

The bamboo blinds to Mingli Hall lifted, and Fengquan, with a horsetail whisk in hand, walked out and bowed in greeting to the ministers. Softly, he said, "The sweltering heat is unbearable, and it has been hard on the various excellencies attending to official duties. Her Highness has specially instructed this humble slave to prepare green bean soup."

The junior eunuchs swiftly came carrying the bowls of soup; the napkin flowers had all been prepared in advance. Fengquan bowed once more and retreated into Mingli Hall.

"Her Highness shows such consideration to us humble ones." An official who had come from a local region said as he sipped the soup, "And for that, we are truly grateful."

Soup spoons knocked lightly against porcelain bowls. An official from the capital asked Jiang Qingshan, who was at the side, "Is Wanxiao used to staying at the relay station?"

Jiang Qingshan finished his soup and gave a slight nod of his head. He seemed rather at odds with his swift and resolute reputation that was the stuff of rumors. His manner was tepid and lukewarm, as if he was also very perfunctory and not that attentive when it came to other matters. After an hour, a eunuch called out his name, and Jiang Qingshan lifted the hem of his robe and entered the hall, where he kneeled and bowed to pay his respect.

“This humble subject, the Provincial Administration Commissioner of Juexi, Jiang Qingshan, pays his respects to Your Highness.”

“Wanxiao, please rise,” Li Jianting said. “The weather is hot today, and I’ve made you stand outside long enough. The Grand Secretary and I were just discussing Juexi’s governmental affairs, and I saw from your memorial that the City of Yongcheng has gone without rain for more than a month. The local granaries are in short supply, so you wish to borrow grains from Huaizhou?”

“The grains requisitioned by the imperial court last year were borne by Juexi. The thirteen cities’ granaries are already depleted.” Jiang Qingshan did not raise his head. “I never expected a drought to hit.”

Kong Qiu said to Li Jianting from the side, “The City of Yongcheng is also the granary of the southwest. If this drought is severe, I fear it would be hard to sustain just by depending on Wanxiao to borrow grains. It’s still necessary to rely on the imperial court to transfer the aid relief grains down.”

The flower embellishment on Li Jianting’s forehead was brilliant red. She pondered it for a moment, then said, “During the reign of Xiande, you offended the local merchants in order to provide relief to the disaster victims, causing them to crowd the yamen to make things difficult for you. This year, you are negotiating with Huaizhou with every means possible for the sake of borrowing grains. It has been hard on you. The City of Yongcheng being hit by disaster is no small matter, but there is no need to worry either. The Grand Secretary and I will give you a solution as soon as possible. The grains will definitely be transferred.”

Jiang Qingshan was already used to hearing words of excuses whenever he entered the capital. Even the former Emperor Tianchen and Emperor Xiande did not possess such a decisive and straightforward attitude. Thus, on hearing Li Jianting saying so, he could not help but put on a solemn countenance and kowtow to pay his obeisances. “This humble subject knows that the imperial court also has to give consideration to the war in Qidong this year. The military provisions have priority. Juexi is willing to use natural silk to offset the debt and exchange it for food with Huaizhou.”

Kong Qiu lost a little of his temper when this was brought up. “The official transfer of public grains can be implemented right after Her Highness endorses it. Why must the Prefectural Prefect of Huaizhou, Tao Ming, defy the edict? Huaizhou had a bumper harvest last year. According to the memorial Tao Ming presented at the beginning of the year, he can afford to give relief grains.”

“The imperial edict was issued several days ago,” Li Jianting said. “Fengquan, go out there and ask if the Prefectural Prefect of Huaizhou, Tao Ming, has arrived. If so, summon him into the hall to give us an explanation.”

Before Fengquan had even stepped out of the hall, Fuman anxiously came to the door and said, “Your Highness, a letter arrived from the postal relay station, saying that the Prefectural Prefect of Huaizhou, Tao Ming, has fled with his entire family!”

Li Jianting was taken aback. “Where did he flee to? The imperial court is summoning him over for a discussion. Why did he flee?”

Fuman stomped his leg lightly. “He defected to Shen Zechuan of Zhongbo!”

Murmurs of discussions promptly filled the hall.

Chen Zhen frowned. “Borrowing grains is a commonplace matter. Why did he run? There has to be a reason!”

“Your Highness is not aware, but,” Fuman said with urgency, “the official who went to summon him opened up the granary in Huaizhou and found that there was not much grain left. It’s not enough to serve as relief grains. Tao Ming acted in collusion with Shen Zechuan and sold the grains all to Cizhou a long time back. The moment he heard that Juexi wanted to borrow grains, he was so frightened that he fled on the very same night!”

An uproar broke out in the hall. Cen Yu stood up. “This... why didn’t the local investigating censor say a word?!”

Huaizhou had no grains, and Hezhou was empty too. They could not count on the Eight Great Cities either. Then, what about the City of Yongcheng? In the end, Juexi still had to tighten their belt to save up the money by the skin of their teeth!

The atmosphere in the hall abruptly plummeted. Air so chilly pervaded the hall from the ice basins in the four corners that Kong Qiu felt a sharp pain in the middle of his back. Covering his nose and mouth, he coughed for a moment, then stood up when his coughing subsided and bowed to Li Jianting. "Disaster relief is of top priority and cannot be delayed. The monthly salaries of the officials in the capital can be reduced accordingly. This humble subject shall get the ball rolling. We must not let the commoners starve to death!"

The officials in the outer area all looked at each other, then kneeled and echoed, "We humble subjects are willing to do so. We ask of Your Highness to agree to it."

The cicadas among the trees were pried off by the eunuchs. Li Jianting rose to her feet too, and in that brief silence, lamented, "How can I stop all of you when you are going to such an extent? Since it's for the sake of Yongcheng's common folks, the palace should also appropriately cut its spending. Wanxiao, you are the one who asks for the grains, so you shall be the one to make arrangements for the aid relief."

Jiang Qingshan kowtowed and said his thanks.

At night, flower lanterns and sheer gauze curtains decorated the courtyard, where a spread of dishes and chopsticks had been laid out. Only Ya'er<sup>36</sup> was waiting in attendance at the side.

Xue Xiuzhuo, dressed in his regular clothes, poured tea for Jiang Qingshan. "Apologies for being the poor host by having you come to my residence."

Jiang Qingshan took the tea and said with a sigh, "There have been so many social engagements since my entry into the capital. All those delicacies cannot compare to your homely fare."

"The life of the poor." Xue Xiuzhuo set down the teapot and, in a rare moment, teased, "Which Provincial Governor is like you? You don't even use a decent horse carriage when you venture out."

"I am truly poor, while you are pseudo-poor," Jiang Qingshan said, "but we are two of a kind who reek of poverty from head to toe!"

Both men clinked their teacup and burst into laughter.

"I can see that the Heir Apparent is intelligent. She treats those under her with decency, and she is straightforward in her handling of matters. She takes after the style of Emperor Guangcheng." Jiang Qingshan picked up the chopsticks and ate the beancurd with shallot. "It's just that she's rather a tad prim and proper, and her manner of speaking is too mature."

"She had a rough time in her youth, so naturally, she's unlike the average girl." Xue Xiuzhuo watched Jiang Qingshan eat his meal. "I saw your letter at the beginning of the year. Liu-niang is pregnant?”

Jiang Qingshan slowed down his speed of swallowing and cast a glance at Xue Xiuzhuo. His smile faded. “The usual.”

So Xue Xiuzhuo did not probe further.

Jiang Qingshan had a wife, but no children. His wife was from the Liu clan in the Prefecture of Baimazhou, and it was not really considered a rich household. She was on good terms with Jiang Qingshan, but to date, both of them had still yet to beget a child. Liu-niang was in poor health. Their firstborn was conceived during the fourth year of Xiande, when Jiang Qingshan was running all over outside to borrow grains. The merchants who came to their doorstep to demand repayments gave Liu-niang such a fright that she miscarried. After that, it had been hard for her to conceive again.

“Why are you so dejected?” Jiang Qingshan set down his chopsticks. “If I’m destined to have no son, then so be it. I won’t force it.” As he spoke, he looked to the cluster of flowers at the side, pausing for a moment. “It’s just that my mother has been pushing us pretty hard, and it’s inevitable that she treats Liu-niang rather... alas.”

Jiang Qingshan’s mother, in her anxiousness to gain a grandson,<sup>37</sup> was rather harsh on her daughter-in-law.

“My mother is advanced in age, and she’s strong-minded by nature. It has been aggravating for Liu-niang to be attending to her. I’ve been busy with government affairs all these years and neglected domestic affairs. In the end, I’ve failed to live up to the vow I made to her back then.” Jiang Qingshan always felt emotional to mention his family affairs. “At the beginning of the year, my mother had some distant niece stay over at our residence, saying that it was only for the time being, but even until now, she’s still there. Several times I went back to see Liu-niang standing primly under the eaves, and yet my mother still wants to match-make me with that woman...”

“If you’re unwilling, it’d be better to turn it down outright,” Xue Xiuzhuo poured more tea for him, “lest the Old Madam thinks it’s feasible and it ends up breaking Liu-niang’s heart.”

Jiang Qingshan stayed Xue Xiuzhuo’s hand. “Let’s have wine instead.”

“I still have to attend to official duties tomorrow morning.” As Xue Xiuzhuo spoke, he looked at Ya’er and motioned for him to get the wine.

“You live alone in this residence. It’s so empty.” Jiang Qingshan raised an arm and waved it. “It’s time for you to settle down with someone too.”

“Han Cheng has only just been eliminated, and the investigation of the field taxes has yet to conclude.” Xue Xiuzhuo took over the wine and poured only for Jiang Qingshan. “If I marry a wife, I’d be leaving her alone in this empty residence, where she’d be wasting away her youth. Why sin thus?”

“There is no end to official business,” Jiang Qingshan said. “Don’t tell me you’re going to carry on like this until you grow old and die?”

Xue Xiuzhuo nodded in all seriousness and started to discuss official matters. “The drought in the City of Yongcheng is not as serious compared to the one during the reign of Xiande, but it has already put you in a terrible fix. Qudu’s reduction of salaries alone is useless if this rain still doesn’t fall after the seventh month, or if a drought hits the rest of the twelve cities. There will still be fatal casualties in Juexi.”

Jiang Qingshan sipped the wine. “The Grand Secretariat is willing in spirit but lacking in power. If there is really a surplus of grains, the Grand Secretary will not make such an unwise move. I’ve been meaning to ask you too. Are the eight cities really empty?”

“Yes. The grains confiscated from the Pan clan of Dancheng,” Xue Xiuzhuo raised a hand and pointed to the side, “are not even enough to feed the people in this palace.”

“We used to lack money in the past.” Jiang Qingshan shook his head. “And now, we lack grains. If we had been able to issue the personnel transfer order earlier to reorganize the Six Prefectures of Zhongbo and recover the vast expanse of fertile lands, Shen Zechuan would not have gone on to become the local overlord, and Dazhou would not be in the predicament it is in today.”

Xue Xiuzhuo said at a slow pace, “The most abundant granaries in the world are now in Zhongbo. If the drought in Juexi worsens after the seventh month, I’ll have to consider buying grains from Shen Zechuan.”

“I fear that will be tough,” Jiang Qingshan said. “Who would have imagined Shen the Eighth would be able to bring the six prefectures under his control? The battle in Duanzhou won him the hearts of the people. This man bears grudges. He will not sell grains to you that easily.”

Xue Xiuzhuo set the wine jar to the side. “If he wants to walk among the world in the name of benevolence and righteousness, he cannot simply sit back and watch the drought ravage Juexi.”

They discussed some more official business. When it was almost time, Xue Xiuzhuo had Ya’er help Jiang Qingshan back to rest. As Jiang Qingshan was leaving, he pointed at the front hall and said, “I met your eldest brother when I arrived at the relay station. He went there to offer offerings to Chengzhi. I see he has been promoted, presumably benefitting from his association with you. Yanqing, he used to make things difficult for you in all kinds of ways possible because he shares the same family name as you. In the end, he still has to survive relying on his connection with you, yet he’s not even willing to say a good word about you.”

Jiang Qingshan was a little drunk, and so a little unsteady on his feet.

“Seeing how smug he is, I fear he will implicate you in the future... You should watch out for him.”

Xue Xiuzhuo responded in acknowledgment.

Ge Qingqing stepped on a stool and shook out the dice as if he was performing magic tricks and said, “My lord, you lost!”

Xue the Eldest drank until his face was all flushed. He touched his pocket and said, “Oh dear me, I forgot to bring my money pouch before I left home! Qingqing, put it on the account!”

Ge Qingqing blew on the dice and looked at Xue the Eldest, saying with a laugh, “My lord, why stand on ceremony with me? It ought to be on my account to begin with. Is the scented tea sent to your residences a few days ago still acceptable? The goods from Qinzhou have also just arrived recently. If there’s anything you have your eyes on, don’t hesitate to let me know.”

“No, no, that won’t do.” Although that was what Xue the Eldest said, he still sat to the side and lit up the pipe. “My residence has everything and does not lack small playthings like this. It’s just that the Ministry of Personnel wants to swap around the assignments in the imperial court of late, and going by what the gonggong said, there’s a lucrative post.”

Ge Qingqing shifted his feet and sat down beside Xue the Eldest. “Then our lord is going to receive a promotion. Congratulations.”

“But the gonggong in this palace all serve the emperor. They have seen a lot and so they turn their noses up at common objects.” Xue the Eldest appeared somewhat hesitant. “Do you have any imported merchandise?”

“Yes, I do. Lots of them. I’ll get Xiaowu to bring the book over later for you to look over and choose.” Ge Qingqing leaned closer. “Whatever you choose, I’ll give it to you. No need to stand on ceremony!”

“You’re truly my buddy!” Xue the Eldest promptly burst into laughter. He pointed at Ge Qingqing. “If this official post really falls into my hands, I’ll make sure to return you double the gift in the future.”

When Ge Qingqing threw the dice, he knocked against the low table at the side, seemingly by accident. The Imperial Bodyguard at the side in disguise as a servant gave a slight nod of his head and prepared the stuff for Xue the Eldest, even remembering to lay out a layer of gold underneath.

It grew even later outside, but Xue the Eldest had long since been having such a good time that he did not even notice it.

CHAPTER 256: ZUZONG (ANCESTOR)

During the hour of you, Li Jianting went for a walk in the garden, her only time for leisure for the entire day. With Fengquan accompanying her at the side, the Heir Apparent strolled along the stone path, still thinking about the government affairs discussed in the hall.

“A few days later, there’s going to be a worshipping ceremony held to pray for rain.” Li Jianting raised her fingers to brush aside the flower branch by her cheek. “This is a matter of importance. Nothing must go wrong on that day.”

Fengquan shifted away the flower branch for Li Jianting and said deferentially, “This humble slave will definitely do his best.”

Li Jianting stood at the edge of the pond and sprinkled fish bait into it. Watching the carps fighting among themselves, she said, “You used to serve Imperial Concubine Mu in the past and you were an arrogant and impudent one who did not know to exercise forbearance, which earned you the censure of the imperial court ministers. Now that you had a close encounter with death, you are a lot more restrained.”

The Heir Apparent certainly did not bring up this matter in the midst of discussing political affairs on a whim. There was something else in those words. Fengquan’s gaze flickered, and as he bowed, he hazarded a guess as to the Heir Apparent’s intent. In a soft voice, he said, “The servant takes after the disposition of his master. Your Highness treats the others with tolerance and magnanimity, and this humble slave, having received Your Highness’s guidance, naturally dare not be as presumptuous as I had been before. I'm ashamed to say that I've been impertinent in the past when I met the various excellencies from the Grand Secretariat, and now that I have been graced with the favor of my lord, I ought to take the past as a cautionary tale and draw my lesson from it."

Li Jianting glanced at Fengquan. "You're a fine one."

Fengquan had served Emperor Tianchen before. Li Jianheng was simple-minded, and his emotions were all clearly written on his face. But ever since Li Jianting entered the palace, she indistinctly began to exude the regal might of a sovereign that made her hard to predict. She had no preference when she had her meals here. No matter how delicious the food was, she would not put her chopsticks to it over three times. Even the delight and fury in her words were tough to differentiate.

"I heard just how harsh Fuman was on you when you were in prison before, and now you're both working together in Mingli Hall," Li Jianting said, "do you harbor any displeasure?"

Fengquan lifted the hem of his robe and kneeled. "This humble slave is Your Highness's slave, and this humble slave is aware that there must be some deeper meaning to Your Majesty's arrangement. Although this humble slave and Fuman used to fall foul of one another, he was also doing his job that time, so this humble slave dare not harbor resentment."

"He nearly broke your leg." Li Jianting looked at the carps that were still fighting for food.

Fengquan kowtowed and choked with sobs. In a thin voice, he said, "The gonggong wielding the flogging rods are all old hands from the Eastern Depot. They know not to go too far."

Li Jianting focused on watching the fishes and said as if nonchalantly, "Although Fuman is a long-time eunuch from the former emperor's reign, he only began to move around in the emperor's presence after the Eastern Depot was left idle." She smiled. "I've never heard of the former emperor ordering him to manage the affairs of the Eastern Depot, and I didn't expect him to be that familiar with the old-timers of the Eastern Depot too. Looks like he's also well-acquainted with the random dogs and cats<sup>38</sup> in my palace too."

Fengquan made use of the action of wiping his tears to wipe his sweat. He instantly understood what the Heir Apparent meant. Li Jianting was poisoned in the palace. All her people in the palace were selected by Xue Xiuzhuo, and even so, they failed to thwart the Empress Dowager, so the perpetrator must have had the help of someone who was familiar with the ins and outs of her palace. Li Jianting used Fuman when she hosted a banquet to kill Han Cheng, and now that the thorn in her side, Han Cheng, had been eliminated, she ought to settle the score.

Fengquan felt a little more settled when he thought to this point. “Since Fuman is an old hand from the reign of the former emperor, he differs from the others in the inner court and yamen. He has vast experience, and he’s in the good books of the various excellencies from the Grand Secretariat, so the number of people he is well-acquainted with is naturally more than this humble slave. Although he has plenty of ‘descendants’,<sup>39</sup> he is cordial to people, attentive to his work, and stays within the confines of propriety.”

“You’re leaving your words unfinished. Stay within the confines of propriety? He seemed to me to be a very ambitious one; A lao-zuzong he is.” Li Jianting took the handkerchief to wipe her hands. “He is but a mere eunuch who has neither the merit in maintaining state stability nor the courage to remonstrate with his sovereign. Yet he can be a ‘lao-zuzong’ just because he has been in the emperor’s presence for long. Whose ancestor?”<sup>40</sup> She looked askance at Fengquan. “Mine?”

Fengquan only felt this breezily-spoken word to be as heavy as the lofty mountains, crushing down on him such that he dared not raise his head. He hurriedly kowtowed, “Your Highness is the noble descendant of the royal family! The glorious legacy of the Great Ancestor<sup>41</sup> is all handed into the hands of Your Highness. Your Highness is the supreme ruler of the world!”

“The eunuch faction threw court politics into a mess during the reign of Emperor Xiande. They killed off a lao-zuzong,<sup>42</sup> but never in my imagination would I expect to come across another one. Evidently, human greed has no limits, like a snake trying to swallow an elephant. All the kind treatment in the world can’t get you loyalty. Favoring and trusting someone too much is bound to lead to disaster.” Li Jianting handed the handkerchief to the palace maid at the side and said, self-mockingly, “However, he does indeed have the capability to really be my ancestor for no rhyme or reason.”

Fuman had “children” and “grandchildren” all over, and he also had contacts with the imperial court officials with the opportunity his working in Mingli Hall accorded him. However, he was cleverer than Pan Rugui here. He did not dare to mess with the etiquettes when he came face to face with the Grand Secretariat officials; in fact, he would not even rule out kowtowing to them once every ten steps if he could. Kong Qiu was previously in ill health, and he had pushed himself through his illness to go about his official duties. Fuman, who was waiting in attendance in Mingli Hall, personally tested Kong Qiu's medicine and meticulously took care of the Grand Secretary, all to build up a good reputation for Li Jianting. Fuman went to such an extent to win imperial favor, but he also just so happened to commit a big taboo. He took it upon himself to curry favor with the imperial censors—but he was a eunuch of the inner palace, so what was he doing trying to win over the outer court officials? He wanted to be both a lao-zuzong in the palace and a decent eunuch outside of it. Now that he had garnered himself quite the prestige inside and outside, it instead held him back from his official duties.

Eunuchs were the slaves of the Son of Heaven, and serving the Son of Heaven was their duty. If Pan Rugui had not set the precedent of undermining court politics, the rights to endorse memorials would not have been reduced to a common-use iron plague<sup>43</sup> for the eunuchs to line their own pockets. But Fuman was respectful and modest to those on the outside while accumulating power on the inside. If Li Jianting wanted to take down Fuman, she needed a reason that could convince the others.

At this time, the sky was inching toward darkness. A line of people bearing lanterns walked from the other end of the garden. Fuman had been doing a good job in his work recently, so his complexion was naturally rosy. From afar, he saw Li Jianting standing by the pond, and the junior eunuch following by his side whispered into his ear, “Zuzong, Fengquan is kneeling!”

Fuman flicked his horsetail whisk. “He has rendered meritorious service earlier during the banquet. If he has been willing to know and keep his place, Her Highness will naturally not make things difficult for him. But that temper of his really leaves much to be desired. It comes as no surprise if he angered Her Highness over some trivial matters.”

With that, he harrumphed slightly, but he was all smiles as he walked over to greet them and bowed to Li Jianting.

“You’re here.” Li Jianting smiled. “Is there a matter of importance?”

“This humble slave thinks of Your Highness all the time.” Fuman passed by Fengquan. Knowing that Li Jianting did not like to be touched, he escorted her down the steps without actually holding her. “So I grew anxious when I didn’t hear any news while waiting in the hall! This humble slave saw the clouds gathering on the horizon, and fearing it would rain later, hurried over to bring an umbrella to Your Highness.”

“You’re indeed a thoughtful one,” Li Jianting said. “Thorough as ever in every matter.”

As if he had only just seen Fengquan, Fuman exclaimed in surprise. “Oh, my, what happened here?”

The sky was silent and still. Amidst the flickering shadows of the light, Li Jianting suddenly hit on a brainwave. Her expression gradually grew frostier. “Arrogant and conceited thing. I heard he was disrespectful to the various excellencies while on duty in the hall, so I had him kneel here as a punishment.”

On hearing this, Fengquan sobbed and prostrated himself over the ground, looking precisely like someone who had just been reproved. He said, “This humble slave was not discerning enough and offended the excellencies. I really deserve death for my sins, Your Highness...”

“I know you served as the Brush-holding Director during the reign of the former emperor, but how can eunuchs be on par with the officials of the previous court? Those local officials who entered the palace to submit their reports are all tiring themselves out working hard for the sake of the local civil administration. Who do you think you are to be showing them the attitude?”

The local officials.

Understanding dawned on Fuman. No wonder Li Jianting was angry. The drought in the City of Yongcheng these days had given the Heir Apparent sleepless nights. Expenditures inside and outside the palace were all being cut back; even the Heir Apparent herself was eating round-grained rice every meal, saying that it was not to forget the hardship of the common folks. She also thought highly of the local officials.

“Your Highness works hard on government affairs in the hall. Coming out to take a stroll in the garden is a rare moment to relax and destress. You mustn’t let this put a damper on your mood.” Fuman guided Li Jianting away and said with an apologetic smile, “His Excellency Xue has also just arrived and is waiting in the hall for Your Highness.”

Fuman cast several glances at Fengquan and said nothing to intercede on his behalf. Li Jianting did not look at Fengquan again and made a beeline back. He served the tea after Li Jianting returned to Mingli Hall and withdrew, and as he waited under the eaves, he asked the junior eunuch in a hushed tone, “Still kneeling?”

The junior eunuch snickered. “Still kneeling.”

“Tell him to get up.”

“Zuzong,” the junior eunuch asked out of curiosity. “Doesn’t he always act all high and mighty? And he’s so smart-mouthed, too. Why is Zuzong helping him? Just let him kneel until Her Highness is done discussing government affairs.”

“As slaves, we have to be of the same mind as our sovereign and relieve our sovereign’s worries,” Fuman said. “He has forged a bond with Her Highness from serving her while she is still the Heir Apparent. Her Highness only told him to kneel without really punishing him, which means she’s treating him with leniency. Her Highness forgot about it at this point in time, but when she remembers it later, and he ends up crying again, then her heart will soften towards him on account of their old ties. I didn’t plead for mercy for him earlier. If I let him kneel any longer, Her Highness is going to reproach us slaves for not knowing any better.”

“Zuzong really does think it through.” The junior eunuch said in admiration. “You’re always reading the master’s mind. Truly brilliant! I’ll go now and get him to stand up.”

Fuman looked back at the dim yellowish candlelight emanating from within Mingli Hall and subconsciously smiled.

Without that old son of a bitch, Han Cheng, he would no longer have a handle out there that others could use against him. He only had to serve the Heir Apparent well, then obtain the Grand Secretariat’s recommendation, and he would enjoy a meteoric rise. Whatever Pan Rugui could do, so could he, except that he wanted to do an even better and an even more beautiful job of it.

Fuman turned his gaze. The only thing was that the Empress Dowager was still around, and that made him unable to rest easy. To eliminate future trouble, he would have to make his move as soon as possible.

CHAPTER 257: TEA-TALK

Shen Zechuan lay in bed, finding it tough to get up. Xiao Chiye had not left and was still in Duanzhou. After the twentieth of the month, the Biansha Cavalry's attacks in the north abated, and Lu Guangbai personally made a trip to Duanzhou.

"The battle in Duanzhou was perilous. Seems like it will take time to repair this city wall." Lu Guangbai dismounted the horse. "Jiming has dispatched military craftsmen over."

Dressed in his regular wear, Xiao Chiye said, "Eldest Brother is indeed thorough in his thinking..." He paused and looked at the horse carriage at the back with a surprised expression, "Eldest sister-in-law is here!"

The maidservant lifted the carriage screen, and Lu Yizhi, clutching her handkerchief in hand, poked her head out.

With a smile on his face, Lu Guangbai announced, "Xun-er is here too."

"I've been missing Lanzhou back at home," Lu Yizhi got off the carriage with the help of her maidservant and said to Xiao Chiye, who had gone over to receive her, "and so I came over for a look."

Xiao Chiye turned aside and said, "Lanzhou misses Eldest Sister-in-law too."

Looking at the city walls of Duanzhou, Lu Yizhi continued, "Now that Zhongbo's victory is already cast in stone, Lanzhou ought to nurse his injuries." She turned her head to the side and pursed her lips into a smile. "I specially brought Xun-er along to relieve Lanzhou's boredom."

Xiao Xun followed behind his mother without needing anyone to lead him by the hand. He bowed to Xiao Chiye, "Second Uncle—"

Xiao Chiye picked up Xiao Xun and hoisted him up mid-air for a closer look. "The little lad has grown taller."

"He's just like you when you were a child." Lu Guangbai handed the horsewhip over to Chen Yang. "He worries all day long that he can't grow taller, and he drinks his milk on time. I asked him what wish he made during the Spring Festival, and he said he wants to grow as tall as his Second Uncle." As he said so, he pinched Xiao Xun's expressionless's cheek. "The nephew is just like his uncle. Well, you can stop thinking about it and just take after me."

"Uncle is good too." Xiao Xun held on to Xiao Chiye's arm for support and said in a childlike voice, "Magnanimous of heart, and not given to embellishment. Uncle is a general who is an equally accomplished man of letters."

The trio laughed, and Lu Guangbai sighed. "Although you're talking about your uncle, it sounds more like you're complimenting your father."

There were now many children in the residence. Ding Tao and Li Xiong still had Jiran with them. Xiao Chiye carried Xiao Xun back, but he struggled, saying he wanted to see Shen Zechuan. Xiao Xun liked Shen Zechuan, so much that he only wanted Shen Zechuan to hold his hand and lead him during the Spring Festival. Shen Zechuan's calves were injured, so he received them before the steps. After entering the house, the few of them exchanged some pleasantries, and Lu Yizhi later asked to bring Xiao Xun along to visit and pay their respects to Ji Gang.

After Lu Yizhi left, Shen Zechuan said, "The war in the north has eased up some. In coming here, General Lu has something to discuss with me on Eldest Brother's behalf."

Lu Guangbai picked up his teacup and smiled as he lifted the lid. He cast a glance at Xiao Chiye, then at Shen Zechuan. "Your Lordship is a heroic man who never forgets about military affairs for even a moment. That's right. Jiming indeed has a message for me to bring to you. Now that Hasen is dead, the crisis in Duanzhou has been averted, and the Youxiong Tribe in the south has been defeated. It's just the perfect time to resume the war."

"With Hasen dead, the status of the 'Great Hero' Amu'er remains to be seen," Xiao Chiye said. "Eldest Brother wants to seize the opportunity to launch a counterattack and seal our victory with this one move.”

“Brothers of the same mind.” Lu Guangbai sipped his tea. “You were thinking that, too.”

Xiao Chiye’s position was close to the window. As he turned his thumb ring, his slightly tilted nape exposed his Adam’s apple under the dim light. “Amu’er could maintain the stability of the various tribes because the Hanshe Tribe’s cavalry is brave and capable warriors, but last year, the Hanshe Tribe’s elites were all sent into the battlefields, where the fighting went on for a year. The Hanshe Tribe has long run out of ammunition and food, and they are not as much of an intimidating deterrent to the other tribes as they were before. With Hasen’s death, Amu’er lost his right arm. If we don’t strike now, then when?”

“If you want to enter the desert from the east, you will need the cooperation of the three armies,” Lu Guangbai said. “Commander-in-chief Qi is still subjected to Qudu’s deployment orders, so this is no easy feat to carry out.”

Xiao Jiming and Lu Guangbai both had a personal relationship with Qi Zhuyin, but this matter had to be directly discussed with Shen Zechuan in Duanzhou, and that was something a personal relationship could not resolve. Qi Zhuyin’s successive deployments of troops were all to assist Libei, but more than half of the Biansha Cavalry had already retreated, and the Youxiong Tribe in the south had been driven back into the desert. She had no reason to make another trip here with Libei.

“The Ministry of War agreed to let Commander-in-chief Qi deploy troops to Gedale because Chen Zhen and the other important, long-time ministers of the state are keenly aware that Libei’s crisis has a bearing on Qudu. Now that Gedale has been fought and beaten,” Lu Guangbai set down his teacup, “it’s a different story altogether.”

Qi Zhuyin did not agree to hand over the Qingshu Tribe’s territory to Hairigu, and she also had the intent to call a temporary halt to the war. It had not been easy for her to borrow grains, and all the grains from Shen Zechuan had to be returned. Let it fester over time, and it would sooner or later leave a bad taste in her mouth. Qidong was fatigued from the war this year, and half of the fields their military troops worked on<sup>44</sup> had been neglected. They had to depend on the imperial court and Shen Zechuan for even the grains needed to survive through the winter, let alone talk about the military grains. It would not have been such a big deal if Qidong was like Hezhou, but Qidong still had the garrison troops, and Qi Zhuyin held military power in her hands. She could not afford to be so slipshod here.

“Commander-in-chief Qi is the Li clan’s commander-in-chief. If she hangs around the rebels, she will be suspected of conspiring against the state.” Shen Zechuan caressed the frame of his fan. “When Qidong dispatched troops against the Qingshu Tribe, there were already impeachment memorials being submitted in the court. If Commander-in-chief Qi attacks the desert together with Libei again, Qudu will be able to dismiss her from her post as the commander-in-chief.”

Qi Zhuyin’s refusal to return Lu Pingyan back then had already earned her censures from the imperial court. She was not well-liked by the imperial censors to begin with. Qi Shiyu married Hua Xiangyi to preserve Qidong’s military power. The Empress Dowager might have fallen from power again, but this layer of connection still remained. Qi Zhuyin killed Han Cheng for Li Jianting when she was in Qudu, and this matter could be both interpreted as loyalty and treachery.

Shen Zechuan’s eyes were mild and gentle in his sickness, as if all his sharp edges had been completely eradicated. “The Heir Apparent is about to ascend to the throne, and going by Xue Xiuzhuo’s intent, she has to confer a reward upon Commander-in-chief Qi.” He drank his tea, looking as if he was conversing about an anecdote from the countryside. “Then we shall wait and see. If the Heir Apparent really does not begrudge it, she’ll be doing us a great favor.”

CHAPTER 258: SMALL FISH (NOT CANG JI)

The Heir Apparent led all the officials to pray for rain, but rain never did fall upon the City of Yongcheng. Jiang Qingshan traversed all over trying to raise grains, while Liang Cuishan was still auditing the accounts of the City of Chuancheng. Marquis of Helian, meanwhile, was so scared witless that he fell seriously ill after Han Cheng's death and did not dare to step out of his residence these few days.

"We can't give them the run-around on this account," Marquis of Helian sighed with distress as he lay on the bed, "and Her Majesty is being confined in the forbidden palace. Heaven wants my Fei clan to perish!"

The junior marquis had also gotten quite the fright from Li Jianting during the banquet that day, so he did not dare to wander all over town either. Keeping watch by his father's side, he reproached, "Why did you have to be that greedy? It's such a large sum of money. We can't even make up for the deficit even if we want to."

"How can you blame me? Who am I doing it for?" Marquis of Helian was in tears. With some difficulty, he propped himself up and pointed at Fei Shi. "Had you not fallen so short on expectations, would I need to plead with the others to such an extent? Look at yourself. You're neither accomplished in literary pursuits nor martial arts. Even if you inherit the marquis title, you'd be just idling around waiting for death. If I don't pull strings, what's going to happen to our Fei clan in the future?"

"Yes, yes, you're right." Fei Shi heard his father gasping urgently for breath and helped him to lie down again. "I'm a rascal, and I'm stupid."

Don't you go making yourself faint from anger."

Marquis of Helian clutched his chest to compose himself as he lay with his tears streaming. "If our properties were to be confiscated... I don't even dare to think about it..."

Commandery Princess Zhaoyue, wearing a white flower behind one of her ears, was holding her child in her arms. She had been staying at home after her divorce, having grown a lot more haggard after hearing of the demise of the Pan clan. She handed the baby over to the wet nurse and motioned for the attendants to leave.

"Had you known it would come to this, would you have acted so—It's too late for regrets now." Commandery Princess Zhaoyue's almond-shaped eyes<sup>45</sup> were slightly reddened. "This account has caused the death of so many people."

"That's right. This account has indeed caused deaths," Marquis of Helian lamented mournfully, "but without this account, how could you have been able to marry into the Pan clan? This prestige and honor of yours were all given to you by this account. When the Hua clan was at the height of their power, Hua Siqian held sway over the court and the common folks. We were under their thumbs and had no choice but to board their boat and throw in our lot with them. After Hua Siqian's death, I was hoping that Shi-er would be able to get an official post and, at the very least, have a say in the imperial court, but he was always fooling around all day long. I was left without a choice."

The Fei clan of the City of Chuancheng had very few male offspring. There was only Fei Shi of lawful birth in the legitimate line of descent. If the Marquis of Helian did not plan ahead, they would become the second Xue clan. However, even though the Xue clan was on the decline, they had still produced a Xue Xiuzhuo. On the contrary, the Fei clan genuinely had no one else in the family.

When Marquis of Helian thought to this point, he got up again and asked, "What's the name of that child who used to serve in the Imperial Bodyguards?"

"You mean, Fei Sheng?" Fei Shi offered.

"Right, right! Fei Sheng," Marquis of Helian said. "It was all because I vouched for him that he could inherit his father's position, and it was also on my account that Han Cheng promoted him.. He later fled with Xiao Chiye, and now, he's serving Shen Zechuan in Zhongbo."

The color drained from Fei Shi's expression. "Those are rebels! Associating with him is punishable by death."

"There's no way we can make up for such a large deficit." Marquis of Helian raised his voice. "Not only will we be confiscated of our properties but also stripped of our noble title. Who knows? Perhaps we will even be beheaded. Look at the Pan clan. How many of their members are still alive? Even if they were sent into exile, they would still die midway through the journey." The more he spoke, the more his heart grew cold. "We might as well switch allegiance to Zhongbo... Even Tao Ming of Huaizhou has fled..."

Fei Shi sat, stunned. He was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, and what's more, he was a junior marquis. All along, he had been an official of Dazhou, and yet, he was now suddenly asked to throw in with the traitors and rebels; he could not help but find it absurd and ludicrous. After sitting in a daze for a while, he said, "No, that won't do. How can I be a disloyal turncoat?<sup>46</sup> Chengzhi did not betray the state even right until the time he died. He and I are bosom friends. I can't do such a disloyal and unrighteous thing. Besides, Shen Zechuan is a vicious and ruthless person who is hard to get along with, while Fei Sheng hankers after fame and power.... No, this won't do."

"Who cares about loyalty and righteousness when disaster is at hand?" Marquis of Helian was exasperated with his son for failing to live up to expectations. "You wouldn't learn what you ought to learn, but you just have to learn all that reeks of Pan Lin!"

"In any case, I'm not leaving." Fei Shi started to get all bull-headed. "For what it's worth, you are a marquis. I don't believe the Grand Secretariat will really lay their hands on you."

"Why won't they dare?" Commandery Princess Zhaoyue wiped her tears. "Without the Empress Dowager, the Heir Apparent will investigate and deal with the matter according to the law. Once the memorandum from the Grand Secretariat is issued, it'd be just a matter of one night for the properties to be confiscated and for the clan to be executed." She thought of Pan Yi and covered her face to weep. "That was what happened to the Pan clan."

"Look at your elder sister. She still has a child." As Marquis of Helian spoke, he shed a torrent of tears too. "Can you bear to see your old father executed, your dear elder sister sent into exile, and the whole family ending up as tombs in mass burial graves?”

“But it won’t do for us to leave either.” Commandery Princess Zhaoyue lifted her head and wiped her tears clean. “Shi-er is right. When Fei Sheng was in the Imperial Bodyguards, he was already a master at currying favors with those in authority for personal gains. He hankers after fame and power. There’s no way to move him if there is no benefit in it for him. Father, please hear what I have to say. The City of Yongcheng is now hit with a drought, and Jiang Qingshan is in Qudu raising grains. But Tao Ming has fled, and the imperial court is in a quandary. Why don’t you sell off our manors and use this sum of money to raise grains for the imperial court?”

“But there are no grains everywhere right now,” Marquis of Helian said. “I won’t be able to raise grains even if I have the money.”

“Buy back the grains from whoever you sold it to to resell.” Commandery Princess Zhaoyue tucked away her handkerchief. “As for Fei Sheng, we’ll talk about him again when the need really arises in the future.”

Mingli Hall replaced its ice basins several days later. Li Jianting was reading the memorials, while Fuman, bowed at the waist, stood in attendance at the side with a fan in hand, gently fanning the Heir Apparent.

“Your Highness has been looking for two hours,” Fuman said softly. “Please take a break.”

Li Jianting closed the memorial. Before she could speak, Fuman turned his head to shout outside, “Bring in the chilled sour plum soup—Your Highness, the weather is hot. Please drink some sour plum soup to dispel the heat.”

Fuman was in Li Jianting’s good graces lately; she still seemed to be angry with Fengquan, keeping only Fuman by her side to serve her. Fuman was as pleased as punch. In the past, he would most certainly not have dared to make the decision for the Heir Apparent, but after several attempts at feeling the Heir Apparent out, he noticed she did not reproach him, and so he grew increasingly bold.

When Li Jianting wiped her hands, Fuman tidied up the tabletop for the Heir Apparent. Li Jianting saw him arranging the memorials one at a time, sorting them in successive order by regions and ministries. Thus, she asked, “Why is this memorial by Ming Zang placed together with the Grand Secretary? From what I remember, they are not from the same hometown.”

“Your Highness may be unaware, but they are teacher and pupil.” Fuman was all smiles. “The Grand Secretary was the one who selected His Excellency Ming for promotion.”

Kong Qiu held the post of the Grand Secretary of the Grand Secretariat. The number of officials from the various ministries he evaluated during the appraisals was too numerous to cite individually. As per customary, these officials could all address him as “Teacher”. It had not been long since Li Jianting took over government affairs, so she indeed did not know. There was such a motley crew of officials from the various ministries in the capital. Unless she paid particular attention to them, it would be difficult for her to remember it.

At present, Fuman was merely serving in the presence of the future emperor. When the time came for the Heir Apparent to ascend to the throne, he could very possibly become the Brush-holding Director, who could hold on to the brush dipped in vermillion ink and comment on or endorse memorials on the emperor’s behalf.

But Li Jianting was not Emperor Xiande. She personally managed government affairs, and she was young, so she did not use eunuchs to handle such important and essential governmental affairs on her behalf at all. In memorizing these relationships by heart, Fuman’s ambition was evident.

It dawned on Li Jianting, who said in understanding, “You know better than I do.”

Fuman was slightly taken aback on hearing that. Reacting quickly, he said, “This humble slave doesn’t handle affairs in the imperial court. This matter was actually mentioned once by the Grand Secretary back in the office compound the last time. This humble slave remembered it while serving at the side.”

“It’s a good thing.” Li Jianting’s expression was mild as she said with a smile, “I just can’t remember, so I’ll still need you to remind me in the future.”

Fuman stole a glance at Li Jianting as he picked up the bowl. It was only when he saw that the Heir Apparent looked normal and no different from how she usually was that he felt relieved. “It’s this humble slave’s great fortune to share Your Highness’s worries.”

“Have the various gentlemen arrived?” Li Jianting asked. “If so, let them in.”

Kong Qiu, Xue Xiuzhuo, and the rest who had just arrived outside Mingli Hall entered on hearing the summon. They kowtowed in unison and greeted, "These humble subjects pay their respects to Your Highness."

"All of you are my teachers." Li Jianting gestured to Fuman to help Kong Qiu up. "There's no need for the Grand Secretary to be so overly ceremonious on entering the hall. It is I who ought to pay my respects to the Grand Secretary as a student."

Kong Qiu took his seat and said with a smile, "Your Highness is now different from the past. There is no need to abide by the formalities between teacher and pupil. Mingli Hall is a place where affairs of the state are handled. There's only the ruler and his ministers here. This humble subject dare not overstep my authority."

Li Jianting could hardly suppress a smile as she scrutinized Kong Qiu. "There's good news today."

Kong Qiu was reticent, experienced, and prudent, so he rarely beamed with such visible joy like this. Sure enough, the next moment, she heard Kong Qiu say, "Jiang Qingshan reported this morning that the relief grains for the City of Yongcheng are already all prepared."

"That's fast." Li Jianting was delighted. "Did he borrow grains from Hezhou?"

"It was the Marquis of Helian." Kong Qiu curbed his delight a little. "Marquis of Helian knew that there were discrepancies with the field taxes. In the hope that Your Highness will be lenient on him, he sold his country estates and raised the grains of his own accord to help the common folks of Yongcheng out of their difficulties."

The case of the Chuancheng field tax was one everyone tacitly understood. The imperial court wanted to recover the arrears, and even re-survey the fertile lands to return to the commoners. No doubt Marquis of Helian would have to bear responsibility for it and accept his punishment. But by doing what he just did, the Grand Secretariat would now have to use their discretion to make a judgment in light of his contribution.

"As the saying goes, there is no room for kindness and tolerance in the law. Your Highness must not take any chances with villains because of this. In this humble subject's opinion," Xue Xiuzhuo kneeled, "Marquis of Helian still has to be investigated and punished according to the law, even if he has prepared grains for the City of Yongcheng."

“When all is said and done, our investigation of the field taxes is to restore the people’s livelihoods in the eight cities. Since Marquis of Helian is willing to raise grains for the City of Yongcheng, it means he is repentant,” Cen Yu said. “Your Highness wants to govern the world with benevolence and filial piety, so if you abide strictly by the law and punish the Fei Clan by confiscating their properties and executing them, I fear you will lose the heart of the people.”

Cen Yu was an old-time minister, and he was an old-time minister who hailed from a humble origin. Yet he was now trying to preserve the life of Marquis of Helian, and it was all precisely for Li Jianting. Marquis of Helian raised grains to provide disaster relief. No matter what, he had made a reputation for being benevolent in the City of Yongcheng. If Li Jianting were to insist on confiscating and executing their whole clan, then to the remaining noble clans who were still adopting a wait-and-see attitude, the only way left for them was to fight to the bitter end.

A long time back, while they were investigating the accounts of the City of Dancheng, Cen Yu had already repeatedly advised Kong Qiu to slow down. The Prefecture of Duanzhou had now scored a resounding victory, and the six prefectures were now all under Shen Zechuan’s command. Once Libei has the war under control, the next stop would be Qudu.

As the saying goes, perseverance yields success, much like how constant dripping water could wear down a stone. Since the noble clans were a long-standing and deeply-rooted malady, they could not rush it, or they would harm their very core—the heart. How would they have the spare energy and strength to deal with Zhongbo then?

Besides, with the re-surveyance of commoners’ fields in Dancheng, they still had to recheck the census register. If the imperial court wanted to focus on treating their malady, then they had to do so on the premise that there was no external threat.

“During the reign of Xiande, the imperial court gave them some latitude, but the eight cities went from bad to worse, eventually bringing about the incident of reselling public grains,” Xue Xiuzhuo said. “If we don’t punish one as a warning to the others, how can we inspire terror in them?”

“The state is now in imminent peril.” Cen Yu kneeled too. “Libei and Zhongbo revolted one after another, and the rebels are assembled in the countryside. Shen Zechuan—”

“It’s precisely because the state is in imminent peril that we have to strictly enforce court discipline. If we can’t root out the noble clans as soon as possible,” Xue Xiuzhuo kowtowed heavily, “then how can we strive to bring peace to the lands?”

Cen Yu raised his head and exhorted earnestly, “The potent medicine has already been administered. The Pan, Han, Hua, and Wei clans have already collapsed, and the vise grip of the noble clans is not as it used to be before. If we do not eliminate external threats at this moment, it will be a great catastrophe in the making. Your Highness, governing a great state is like cooking a small fish!”<sup>47</sup>

Li Jianting pondered it over without saying a word.

Waves of heat outside the hall billowed. It was so quiet it was terrifying. After a long time, a junior eunuch with a look of urgency swiftly made his way before the hall and whispered something into Fengquan’s ear.

“Your Highness!” The beaded curtain swung wildly. Fengquan announced, “Her Majesty is critically ill!”

Everyone in the hall turned pale.

CHAPTER 259: RUMORS

When Li Jianting arrived, the imperial physician in the hall prostrated himself on the ground in panic. Matron Liu Xiang kneeled by the side of the bed, holding the Empress Dowager's hand as she called out softly, "The Heir Apparent is here."

The Empress Dowager's breathing was slightly urgent as she turned her eyes and saw Li Jianting. She was sweating profusely, and her non-makeup face was lined with some wrinkles, finally belying her old age. Her breath was thin and feeble as she said, "I... want to speak to... Her Highness."

Matron Liu Xiang stood up and retreated with the attendants.

The drapes in the hall were hung up on both sides. A fragrant scent wafted from the Buddha statue niche, while wispy, willowy smoke obscured the statue, rendering its compassionate expression indistinct.

Li Jianting bent over to pick up the rosary of prayer beads that had fallen between the rug and caught a waft of rich sandalwood.

"You hosted a banquet to kill Han Cheng." The Empress Dowager turned her head to the side, her hair all let down. "And so I knew... you would not tolerate... my existence either."

"Although I have the intent, I am too powerless." Li Jianting twirled the Buddha beads. "The way Fuman is so anxious makes it clear that Your Majesty has lost the heart of all. The end is nigh."

The Empress Dowager's chest heaved, but she forced herself to smile with some difficulty. Her gaze passed through Li Jianting. "You're indeed..."

Emperor Guangcheng's daughter... How laughable your Li clan is... Had you been a man..."

"Had I been a man, I would not have lived to this day." Grasping the prayer beads, Li Jianting sat on the edge of the bed. "You killed off all the men in the Li clan."

The Empress Dowager's soaked hair on her temples stuck to her cheeks, offering one a glimpse of her unsurpassed beauty in those bygone times. Her lips quivered. "Who could have imagined that he would be that ruthless? He would rather commit incest and leave such a scourge to me..." With mirth brimming in her eyes, she continued, "He was the one... who forced Prince Qin... to his death..."

Looking at the Empress Dowager, Li Jianting said, "You killed your husband and your sons to get to where you are today. You could have been an unprecedented emperor never seen before in history, but you handed over the power and authority to others. You trusted eunuchs easily, allowing them to undermine court politics, and you favored and helped Elder Brother, bolstering the influence and arrogance of the ministers in power... You can hardly absolve yourself from blame now that the state is in imminent peril."

The smile in the eyes of the Empress Dowager gradually waned. She stared at Li Jianting. "It's lonely at the top... You don't understand... I am like a floating duckweed with no one to depend on..."

"I am like a floating duckweed with no one to depend on..." Li Jianting repeated these words. There was no sorrow on her face, nor was there a smile. She looked away, her gaze gliding past the drapes before settling on the Empress Dowager's dressing table. Fixing her eyes on that clear yellow bronze mirror, she said, "Since you do not have the boldness of vision to dedicate yourself to the cause, why stir up such havoc in this political storm?"

"You are a woman too," the Empress Dowager said. "Why do you not understand me?"

"I am neither a woman nor a man." Li Jianting looked at the Empress Dowager again, her eyes clear and bright. "I'm merely Li Jianting."

The Empress Dowager felt at a loss. After a while, she said, "When I saw you, I realized just how regal the Emperor of the Li clan is... but you too, are also in the control of another."

“The chessboard lies in no one’s hands, but in the lands of the empire,” Li Jianting said softly. “Those who think they are holding the chess pieces are merely late to the game.”

The Empress Dowager’s breathing grew weaker, and her voice too, turned softer, “...Poor Xue Xiuzhuo, for all his scheming and plotting...” She widened her eyes slightly and murmured, “the lands of the empire, huh...”

The last rays of the setting sun outside the palace faded away. Several birds flew across the blue sky. A petal dropped off the peony that had not been secured in place and landed on the dressing table, where a nudge of the wind sent it on its way.

The news from Qudu was urgently dispatched to Qidong. Horse hooves crashed through the silent night, arriving at the Bianjun Commandery several days later. Hua Xiangyi still had yet to retire for a rest. Seeing the postal report coming in, she asked with a smile, “Is my auntie’s letter here too?”

Qi Wei’s expression was odd as he hesitated at the door.

As if sensing something, Hua Xiangyi slowly got up. “Did she fall ill?”

Qi Wei avoided her gaze and hung his head down. “To reply Eldest Madam... Her Majesty has passed.”

Hua Xiangyi immediately took a step back, and Hongying hurriedly held her to support her. She looked dazedly at Qi Wei. The tears were already flowing a moment later. Bracing herself against Hongying’s arm for support, she took several steps towards the door and said in a hoarse voice, “...Don’t lie to me.”

Qi Wei kept silent.

Hua Xiangyi hastily covered her mouth with her handkerchief and gradually broke into sobs. “How... how could this be...”

Before Qi Wei could answer, he heard Hongying shout, “Madam!”

Hua Xiangyi, already tilting and sliding down against her, had fainted.

The inside of the tent was lit with mind-calming and sleep-inducing incense. When Hua Xiangyi woke up, Qi Zhuyin was sitting in the chair beside the bed peeling an apple. Sensing that Hua Xiangyi had awakened, she set it aside on the small table at the side and wiped her hands before touching Hua Xiangyi's forehead. "You don't even know you have fallen sick."

Hua Xiangyi's lips were pale. She did not open her eyes as she soaked the side of the pillow wet.

Qi Zhuyin was not adept at comforting others. Seeing how sorrowfully Hua Xiangyi was crying, Qi Zhuyin hurriedly wiped her tears for her with the handkerchief. It was only when she was done wiping that she belatedly remembered that this was the handkerchief she used to wipe her hands. Hua Xiangyi turned her back to her and curled her knees up, sobbing inconsolably until she was tired and fell asleep in the same position. When she woke up again, Qi Zhuyin was still sitting in the chair.

"News travels slowly," Qi Zhuyin said. "...The new emperor is about to ascend to the throne soon. I'll take you back."

"Since auntie is gone, there is no longer any place there that I want to return to." Hua Xiangyi blinked her red, swollen eyes. "When we parted, auntie was still in good health. It has only been two months. To think she has passed away from illness."

Qi Zhuyin was silent for a spell. "... I promised you not to let her die."

"Commander-in-chief Qi is far away in the Bianjun Commandery, and the reach of your power is limited," Hua Xiangyi said. "The forbidden palace is not the imperial court. Blades are invisible there. Even the Grand Secretary's reach does not extend there."

Qi Zhuyin thought Hua Xiangyi was going to say something, but she stopped right here and propped herself up.

"Commander-in-chief Qi is busy with military affairs," Hua Xiangyi said. "So just leave me be."

Hua Xiangyi's wrists dipped in the cold, frosty moonlight. The way she looked with her eyes lowered was very haggard. It would not do for Qi Zhuyin to linger any further, so she felt around her sleeve for a small scented pouch and set it in her lap.

"Hongying is waiting in attendance at the door." Qi Zhuyin rose to her feet. "I'll be in the side hall."

At this time, the night was already drawing to a close. Hongying heard Hua Xiangyi's summon during the hour of mao, so she sent someone to the kitchen to get breakfast while she herself went in.

"Bring my chest over," Hua Xiangyi said.

Hongying went to the cupboard and took down Hua Xiangyi's little chest. Hua Xiangyi unlocked it and instructed Hongying to bring the copper basin over. Then she burned the account books in the chest.

"Madam, what are you doing?" Hongying anxiously moved to stop her. "These are all accounts Madam went to painstaking efforts to calculate."

"The Heir Apparent promised Commander-in-chief Qi not to kill my auntie." Hua Xiangyi released her slender fingers and watched as the fire gradually devoured up the account books. "If she wasn't the one who did it, then she's incompetent. If she was the one who did it, then she's untrustworthy."

The breeze flipped the pages open and, under the sound of fire crackling, scattered ashes all over the ground.

The night in Duanzhou was cool, and the courtyard was full of flowers and trees. Mosquitoes were plentiful too. Fei Sheng lit incense in the newly erected pergola. Shen Zechuan stirred the ice-cubes in his bowl with the spoon, making a slight noise. As he watched Xiao Chiye guiding Xiao Xun to pull the bow, he listened to Fei Sheng reporting the updates from Qudu.

"If Xue the Eldest wants the important post of being in charge of the granaries, he has to deal with the eunuchs. The eunuchs in the palace are fond of the imported merchandise from the Port of Yongyi. Have Qingqing prepare it for him."

"Qingqing said it's already all prepared. When the new emperor ascends to the throne, she is bound to grant a general amnesty to everyone in the world. When the time comes, Xue the Eldest will get his chance to make a name for himself," Fei Sheng said. "Also, with the empress dowager's demise, the noble clans are in a precarious situation. However, Marquis of Helian sold his fields to raise grains, so the Grand Secretariat might very well go lenient on him."

"The fact that Marquis of Helian could think of raising grains shows that he is already being forced into a corner. He has no other choice but to sacrifice what he holds dear and start afresh." Shen Zechuan sipped the soup. "I have already done my part and fulfilled my moral obligations in giving him grains."

The grains Marquis of Helian bought by selling off his family assets were from You Tan, the Prefectural Prefect of Liuzhou in Juexi. Back then, when Yan Heru said he wanted to build a new port, Shen Zechuan agreed to it, and You Tan of Liuzhou was their inside man in Juexi. This Prefectural Perfect was just like his name suggested—he was especially greedy. As long as he was paid enough, he would dare to take part in even transactions that could cost him his head. Otherwise, he would not have had any dealings with Yan Heru right under Jiang Qingshan’s nose.

“Xue Xiuzhuo is too radical. If the battle in Zhongbo was still ongoing, Kong Qiu and Cen Yu could still have agreed to it, but now, I have my hands unoccupied.” Shen Zechuan’s eyes reflected fireflies on the side.

“They naturally do not wish to engage in a life or death fight with the noble clans anymore. Joining forces to attack the enemies is the top priority. As long as the Heir Apparent is not a fool, she will pardon Marquis of Helian.”

“Then why are we still giving the Marquis of Helian grains?”

This batch of grains that Shen Zechuan had You Tan give to Marquis of Helian was not only offered at a fair price but were also all good-quality grains.

“The relief grains have to be given, of course.” Shen Zechuan looked at Fei Sheng. “Just get You Tan to tell the truth.”

Understanding promptly dawned on Fei Sheng. He laughed, “Master is wise!”

On the other end, Xiao Chiye released his fingers, and the sharp arrow struck the bull’s eye. Chen Yang and the other guards cheered in unison.

Fei Sheng sighed with feeling, “This arm strength of Second Master.”

Shen Zechuan watched Xiao Chiye for a long time before saying to Fei Sheng, “Elder Yin’s funeral arrangements are all settled. As for his remaining possessions... you’re the son, so you decide.”

“Where would he have a single decent stuff... Just throw away all the tattered mat and blankets. Burn it to him.<sup>48</sup> I’m scared of him scolding me too.” Fei Sheng raised a hand to press down on the blade at the side of his waist. “I’ll just keep this. This blade is nameless, as is he.”

“Elder Yin is a hero,” Shen Zechuan said. “This blade ought to have a name.”

“He and I both follow Master.” Fei Sheng grasped the blade. “So I’d like to ask of Master to bestow a name upon it.”

As Shen Zechuan turned the porcelain bowl, he saw moonlight flashing across the side of the bowl, rendering it bright as snow. He said, “A banner of ten thousand to slay the King of Hell.<sup>49</sup> Let’s name it Zhan Yan Luo.”<sup>50</sup>

Fei Sheng lifted the hem of his robe and kneeled, saying in a loud and clear voice, "This blade shall not fail its name!"

With the passing of the Empress Dowager, the enthronement of the Heir Apparent could no longer be delayed any further. The Grand Secretariat drew up the plan, with the date fixed at the beginning of the eighth month following right after the funeral. The reign title<sup>51</sup> selected was "Shengyin."

When Xiao Chiye heard it, he said, "The Heir Apparent has drive and spirit."<sup>52</sup>

At the beginning of the eighth month, Kong Qiu led the various officials to kowtow before Mingli Hall and pay their obeisances to the new emperor. Li Jianting thus became the veritable emperor of Dazhou.

"Guess what noble rank the new emperor is going to bestow upon Commander-in-chief Qi." Shen Zechuan had been cooped up all day in the house teasing Xiao Xun. With Xiao Chiye here this time, he teased Xiao Chiye instead. "There's a prize for the correct guess."

"What's the prize?" Xiao Chiye looked at his military affairs and let Lanzhou pressed down on his back. "The prize has to be enough."

Wherever Shen Zechuan saw, he used his folding fan to draw over to that spot. He found it rather comfortable to be pressing down on Xiao Chiye like this. "Anything is fine."

"Marquis." Xiao Chiye caught Shen Zechuan's hand and turned it over in his palm to look at the scar. "With the commanding sway the Prince of Libei has over the lands following its rise as a precedent, Qudu will not confer another as the Prince of Qidong."

Lu Pingyan of the Bianjun Commandery was already a Marquis of Bianbo.<sup>53</sup> Qi Zhuyin was the commander-in-chief of the Five Commanderies' troops. If she were to be of equal rank with Lu Pingyan, it would be a gross injustice. But since the reign of Yongyi, Dazhou only had two conferred princes of different surnames.<sup>54</sup> One was the Prince of Libei, Xiao Fangxu, and the other was the Prince of Jianxing, Shen Wei. Qi Zhuyin's meritorious military achievement was not on par with Qi Shiyu's, and she was not in the imperial censors' good graces either. Her conferment would be beset with difficulties. Weighing the two against the other, it would be much more appropriate to confer her with the title and rank of a marquis.

“Then I will guess a prince.” Shen Zechuan said into his ear. “If I win, you have to give me a reward.”

Fuman changed into his new robe. As he headed towards Mingli Hall, all the eunuchs and palace maids along the way had to pay their respects to him. He was puffed up with pride with his success, but he did not forget his place here, retreating each time he encountered a minister of the court, looking even more humble and deferential.

Fuman arrived at Mingli Hall, and the junior eunuch waiting in attendance at the door whispered, “Her Majesty has just woken up and is currently looking for Zuzong.”

Fuman patted his sleeves and strode in. He took over the tea from the palace maid and presented it to Li Jianting. “Your Majesty.”

Li Jianting often slept poorly. Pinching the middle of her brows, she accepted Fuman’s tea and took a sip. “What did the Grand Secretary say?”

“This is the Grand Secretary’s memorandum. Please take a look.”

Fuman took out the Grand Secretariat’s note from his sleeve and presented it to the imperial desk. “If Your Majesty agrees to it, it can be issued tonight.”

Li Jianting read the memorandum Kong Qiu drafted and pondered over it for a while. “The preceding Lu Pingyan was a marquis too. If we conferred Qi Zhuyin as a marquis again, I fear it will incur Qidong’s displeasure.”

Li Jianting often spoke to Fuman about government affairs. Fuman did not steer clear of the taboo either. Slightly embellishing what he heard in the Grand Secretariat’s office compound, he said, “Lu Guangbai defected. If Lu Pingyan were to be detained in Qudu, he would have been stripped of his noble rank, so his Marquis of Bianbo* title and rank no longer stands. Your Majesty is the new emperor, and Commander-in-chief Qi is a new subject of yours. Conferring her as a marquis is already a great kindness.”

“You have a point.” Li Jianting set the note on the table. “Then let’s—”

Li Jianting had yet to finish her words, and Fuman was in the midst of preparing the ink when they heard someone outside the hall announce Kong Qiu’s arrival. With this interruption, Li Jianting set the matter aside and had Kong Qiu enter first.

Kong Qiu’s face was ashen as he lifted the hem of his robe and knelt down. After he kowtowed and paid his respect, he said in a heavy voice,

“Your Majesty, there is an issue with the relief grains sent to the City of Yongcheng. The memorial from Juexi just came in, so this humble subject dare not tarry!”

Fuman immediately stepped forth to receive the memorial and handed it over to Li Jianting’s desk.

The moment Li Jianting opened it for a look, her heart promptly sank.

“Rumors are now rife in the City of Yongcheng. They are all saying that the relief grains are provided by Shen Zechuan of Zhongbo, who is helping in secret. Discussions are abuzz, with everyone speaking with conviction.” Kong Qiu said. “If we let it go unchecked, I fear...”

“If we stop the distribution of the relief grains at this point in time, it will only confirm that these grains have something to do with Shen Zechuan.”

Qudu had no grains, and there was only this batch of grains that could provide aid relief to the drought-hit City of Yongcheng. Li Jianting could not let the common folks of the City of Yongcheng starve to death. But as Kong Qiu said, if they were to let it be, then everyone would soon take it as the gospel truth; after all, three men could make a tiger.<sup>55</sup> And Shen Zechuan would then benefit wholly at the expense of the imperial court, becoming the benefactor of the City of Yongcheng.

This one move was underhanded and ruthless.

And Li Jianting finally got a first-hand taste of it.

CHAPTER 260 : BESTOWMENT

“Reward him.” The gears in Li Jianting’s mind whirled as she shut the memorial. “Marquis of Helian has made significant contributions in the raising of grains. I<sup>56</sup> must reward him handsomely.”

Kong Qiu prostrated over the ground, nodded approvingly to himself, and spoke in a respectful tone. “Your Majesty is wise.”

No matter the situation, the relief grains could not be recalled. If Li Jianting rewarded Marquis of Helian handsomely now, the rumors would be discredited on their own. Since Shen Zechuan intended to fight a war of benevolence and righteousness with her, she was all game for it.

“Han Cheng monopolized power and deceived his master, and he even harbored the intent to usurp the throne. His crimes are too reprehensible and heinous to be pardoned,” Li Jianting said, “To ensure my safety, Commander-in-chief Qi captured that Han traitor in my stead; it’s indeed a meritorious achievement. Furthermore, she returned in resounding victory after mobilizing troops against the Qingshu Tribe. Whether for personal or official reasons, I must bestow upon her a title.”

“Commander-in-chief Qi has had her fair share of suffering the bitter cold and impoverishment being stationed at the Bianjun Commandery,” Kong Qiu said. “Long since the reign of Xiande, she has earned herself laudable merit for sending troops to come to the rescue of the emperor. How does Your Majesty intend to go about conferring a title on Commander-in-chief Qi?”

“I’ve heard that Commander-in-chief Qi has the reputation of being known as ‘Wind Guiding the Scorching Plains’,” Li Jianting raised her brush and wrote two neat characters on the paper. “Why not bestow upon Commander-in-chief Qi the title, ‘Prince of Donglie’?”

Kong Qiu immediately raised his head and responded in astonishment, “That’s...”

“Qi Zhuyin has thrice stepped out of Qidong to come to the emperor’s rescue, burned down the thirteen camps of Biansha with aid of the wind, and penetrated deep into the enemy’s territory alone to save her father. Ever since she has assumed the post of the commander-in-chief of Qidong’s five commanderies’ troops, the commandery and twin passes have been impenetrable. From the reign of Xiande to Tianchen, not a single soldier from Biansha managed to invade our Qidong’s territory.” Li Jianting raised her eyes. “So why can’t I bestow the title of a prince upon such a loyal, steadfast, and valiant general?”

“But Commander-in-chief Qi is a woman,” Kong Qiu replied. “It’s already a breach of protocol for her to be able to set foot on Yulong Terrace to present herself before the emperor and receive her conferment. If she were to be conferred the title of prince,<sup>57</sup> a public outcry would no doubt ensue. Your Majesty, please think thrice!”

Li Jianting looked at Kong Qiu and said, “The Grand Secretary once taught me<sup>58</sup> during lessons that ‘the sovereign and his ministers ought to stand together in times of turmoil and peace.’<sup>59</sup> I should accept admonishments borne out of loyalty with graciousness, and treat the valiant and the virtuous with magnanimity. Qi Zhuyin is now not only able to stand guard at all quarters on my behalf, but also to capture and kill rebellious traitors for me. She treats me with utmost sincerity and loyalty, and yet I’m still going to harp on the distinction between men and women. Won’t that make the hearts of all the heroes and talents in the world turn cold with disillusionment?” She left her seat and stepped forward to help Kong Qiu up, saying with sincerity, “Teacher, she is a woman, yet she is willing to don military armor to slay the enemies. Take away her heartfelt sincerity in dedicating herself to the service of her country, and all that remains is her righteousness in being loyal to her sovereign. What’s more, I’m* also a woman. Teacher teaches me* all that I* have to know without reservation, and even assists me* in governing the state. Is the so-called distinction between men and women really that important?”

Li Jianting swapped from the imperial “I” used exclusively by the emperor to the common “I” used by all, but Kong Qiu could not switch from “Grand Secretary” to “Teacher”. In addition to her heartfelt words, the new emperor wanted to confer a title upon Qi Zhuyin also because Zhongbo and Libei both had well-trained and powerful armies. Relying on just the Eight Great Training Divisions to defend the city gates of Qudu was akin to throwing an egg against a rock. Only Qi Zhuyin – a Qi Zhuyin who held in her grasp the 300,000 troops of Qidong – could go head to head against the rebels.

“Your Majesty’s conferment of a title by imperial decree is already generous to Qidong, but this noble rank is truly too high a rank.” It was not that Kong Qiu did not understand the situation; on the contrary, he understood it all too well. Once Qi Zhuyin was conferred a prince, there would no longer be any other military power in the present Dazhou that could act as a counterbalance against Qidong. The rise and fall of the entire dynasty would thus come to depend on these 300,000 forces of Qi Zhuyin. If they scored a victory, what other titles could they confer upon Qi Zhuyin in the future? She had already achieved the same position as Xiao Fangxu. Not only would there be nothing else to confer upon her, there was also no longer a Libei that could mutually hold her in check.

Li Jianting similarly understood this, but Qi Zhuyin was on good terms with the Xiao clan of Libei, and this was the only thing she had left in her hands to give Qi Zhuyin.

“There lies a sharp sword on the tongue, that kills without spilling a drop of blood.”<sup>60</sup> Yao Wenyu held the scissors in hand and did an ugly job of trimming the potted plant on his lap. “Once rumors start spreading, it’s tough to eradicate them altogether. The new emperor is forced by the current political situation to reward Marquis of Helian handsomely. Her intent to kill off Marquis of Helian is already set in stone.”

“It looks to me that the new emperor acts neither like Xue Xiuzhuo nor Kong Qiu in handling matters.” Shen Zechuan bent over to pick up the broken branch that had fallen to the ground. “She has her own mind.”

“She has just ascended to the throne, and already she has seen the world,” Yao Wenyu said. “How would she still be willing to remain a chess piece? She is already staking it all by conferring Commander-in-chief Qi as the ‘Prince of Donglie’. Although Your Lordship has slightly gained the upper hand in providing aid relief to the City of Yongcheng, it has also put You Tan in a dangerous position. If Marquis of Helian were to confess about him under heavy torture, then our inside man in the Prefecture of Liuzhou would be forfeited.”

“The new future port in Liuzhou will have merchandise moving throughout the entire territory.” Shen Zechuan tossed the broken branch into the pond in the courtyard. “The handling of the tariffs has a significant bearing on many matters. You Tan is not a good candidate for it. Tell him to pay more attention since Xue Xiuzhuo is determined to investigate the accounts. After all, he has a pile of bad debts at home. I fear he will be too powerless to fend for himself when the time comes.”

You Tan was a money-grubber. He was convenient to use, but not convenient to keep around. The most accessible connection Shen Zechuan had in Juexi was the Xi clan’s contacts, but he still picked You Tan to do business with the Marquis of Helian.

This was his lord and master’s idea, so Yao Wenyu could not discuss it in depth. Even if he saw through it, he could not expose it. The potted plant on his lap grew more and more bare. Yuanzhuo said, “Looks like Xue the Eldest has already gotten what he wanted from Ge Qingqing’s latest update.”

“A great position indeed in the palace granaries of Qudu, managing the coming and going of supplies in the capital. As long as he has a mind to bribe, he will be able to line his pockets full. Xue the Eldest has been the rich young master of a noble clan for all his life, so how could he stand to suddenly become a small-time, down-and-out official? Xue Xiuzhuo has been particularly careful when it comes to promoting or conferring titles upon his fellow kinsfolk of the Xue clan. He’s unwilling to show favoritism and help the Xue clan, and that has long incurred the disapproval and criticism of those in the same clan.” Speaking to this point, Shen Zechuan watched Jiran chase after Xiao Xun as they frolicked at the end of the walkway. “After taking a look at you that day, Jiran has never gone back looking for you?”

“Xue Xiuzhuo is thorough in everything he does. Since he wants to kill me, he will not show mercy. Even if the Venerable Master is alive, there is no cure for both these legs and this poison. Jiran is young; Your Lordship need not make things difficult for him,” Yao Wenyu said calmly. “There is no need to force the matter. Let’s leave it to Heaven’s will.”

Xiao Xun fell on the ground and quickly scrambled to his feet before running with stalks of grass on him.

Yao Wenyu released his grip on the scissors. He was not particularly fixated on this. He continued, “The Hereditary Prince is healthy. He is neither arrogant nor delicate. I can tell he’s naturally talented and intelligent, and he excels in learning. With the teaching and guidance of the various gentlemen in the future, he is sure to live up to expectations.”

Shen Zechuan said nothing.

Yao Wenyu then smiled. He gifted the potted plant to Shen Zechuan. “Your Lordship is still hesitating.”

Shen Zechuan raised his left, fan-holding hand and pointed towards the west. “The empire is a cage.”

Qudu was the freest place of all in the world. It was also the world’s worst prison.

“Even brothers born of the same parents differ from each other, just like the nine sons of a dragon are different in their own ways,” Yao Wenyu said. “Can the wolves of Libei only run in the grasslands? The Hereditary Prince is bright and intelligent, so why not Your Lordship ask him himself?”

Xiao Xun was tired of playing, but he still kept his spirit up, wanting Shen Zechuan to lead him by the hand back. He walked past the pond and pointed to the water as he said to Shen Zechuan, “Second Uncle, this is a bright mirror.”

He called Xiao Chiye Second Uncle, and so Xiao Chiye taught him to address Shen Zechuan as Second Uncle too.<sup>61</sup>

“Yes,” Shen Zechuan said, “by looking into the mirror, you can straighten out your clothes.”<sup>62</sup>

Facing the water surface, Xiao Xun patted his robe clean.

It had to be known that when Xiao Chiye was of the same age, he was still running after the colts and yearning to sleep all day long among the grass. Xiao Xun resembled Xiao Jiming in the looks department, but from what Xiao Chiye had divulged to him, even if Xiao Jiming was not as prone to getting a beating as Xiao Chiye was, he was not this quiet either when he was this old.

“Did you come looking for Mister today to teach you to read?” Shen Zechuan asked.

Xiao Xun nodded. “Reading can make one wise.”

“There are so many learned gentlemen in residence.” Shen Zechuan’s folding fan lifted slightly to point at Yao Wenyu’s room. “Why must you pick this one?”

“Mister Chengfeng said Mister Yuanzhuo is the most learned and knowledgeable.” Xiao Xun paused for a moment, then raised his head to say to Shen Zechuan, “I want the best teacher.”

After a moment’s silence, Shen Zechuan asked, “What if there is no Yuanzhuo?”

“Mister Yuanzhuo said, he who stands on his toes is not steady, while he who takes long strides cannot keep up pace.”<sup>63</sup> Xiao Xun pointed at himself. “Even if Xun’er wants the best teacher in the world to teach me, Xun’er must be able to understand too. I cannot reach for what is beyond my grasp.”

The way he spoke was sophisticated. Merely seven years of age, and he had already far surpassed his peers. Influenced by Yao Wenyu, the gentlemen in residence would occasionally engage in philosophical discourses<sup>64</sup> when they had no government affairs to attend to. Xiao Xun did not like those discourses, but he would always sit by the side to listen whether it was Xiao Chiye handling military affairs or Shen Zechuan discussing political affairs.

“Are you working so hard because you want to become the best teacher?”

With a strange expression, Xiao Xun shook his head at Shen Zechuan and said, “Xun’er is not a teacher, but Xun’er wants teachers.” Saying so, he pointed at Fei Sheng. “Xun’er is not a general, but Xun’er wants generals too.”

Of the learned the sage beckons, into my trap the heroes walk!<sup>65</sup> Whether the civil ministers or military generals, he wanted all the “best”. This was the grand ambition of recruiting all the virtuous and talented in the world.

Shen Zechuan squeezed Xiao Xun’s hand and spoke no further.

The new emperor granted a general amnesty to all in the world, and personnel from the Six Ministries were transferred around. On the day of Xue the Eldest’s promotion to the custodian of the palace granaries, he held a feast on Donglong Street and invited his distant relatives and next-door neighbors to vindicate himself.

Having drunk himself drunk, he let Ge Qingqing support him as he staggered his way home. “The tables have turned. I’m a lucky man. What’s more, I’m the legitimate son of direct descent.” He held up a finger and said to Ge Qingqing, “My courtesy name is ‘Pingjing’. Ping—Jing! Xue Xiuzhuo’s courtesy name is ‘Yanqing’. Extend whose integrity?”<sup>66</sup> He patted his own chest and said with a smile, “Mine. It’s mine. I’m his eldest brother. I should be standing—burp—higher than him to begin with!”

Ge Qingqing swayed with him and repeatedly concurred, “Yes, yes, it is as my lord says.”

“Lord,” Xue Pingjing said in a loud voice. “That’s right. I’m the lord! Why do, do I have to take my cues from him? He’s a mere son of a concubine who seized, seized my head of family position, and divided up the family property to kick all of us out. He is really, the most, most cold-blooded and merciless person.” He waved his hand, looking as if he could not deign to speak about Xue Xiuzhuo. “Look at him. He has become a minister of importance in the imperial court, yet he isn’t willing to help us financially... Is this, this something a human would do?”

Ge Qingqing did not answer.

“You’re all afraid of him.” Xue Pingjing’s puffs of breath reeked of wine. “What’s so scary about him? He is of low, lowly birth, born to a concubine! When we went to school last time, I knew he was one who wouldn’t be content with his lot in life.” On touching upon his sore point, he unexpectedly started to choke with sobs, “I’m his eldest brother. Who is he to be more talented than me? He wouldn’t do it when those at home told him to write essays for me... Had he done so, I’d be an important minister too now.”

The more Xue Pingjing cried, the sadder he was. Eventually, he held on to the wall for support and, with a “blargh“, puked.

“He said I showed favoritism to my concubine... and neglected my son’s studies... so he wouldn’t allow us father and son to meet again...” Paying no attention to the wretched mess, Xue Pingjing covered his face and bawled, “He’s really a heartless one! Even if my son becomes an ignorant and incompetent ne’er-do-well in the future, he’s still my son! He snatched another man’s son. He is not fit to be human!”

Ge Qingqing said comfortingly, “Now that my lord has also been promoted, you will be able to exchange words with the gonggong in the palace. Naturally, there will be opportunities for you to ask for your eldest son back.”

Xue Pingjing wiped his tears and clutched Ge Qingqing’s arm tightly as he spat with hatred, “I’ve seen him rise to the height of his power, and I want to see him plunge all the way down too!”

Author’s Note:

I made up the position of the palace granaries custodian. (内仓典守) There was indeed a similar position in the Ming system, but I can’t really remember offhand what it’s called.

Credit: Special thanks to MaruChan for spotting the typo! <3

CHAPTER 261 : OF BENEVOLENCE & INTIMIDATION

The next day at noon, the Marquis of Helian headed over to Mingli Hall to give his thanks for the reward.

Fuman stopped him and advised, “Your Lordship, please hold on. Her Majesty is taking a nap right now. She will not be able to summon you until a little later.” He turned aside. “If you’re not in a hurry, you may wait here first.”

The Marquis of Helian made a special trip here today to express his loyalty. The rumors in the City of Yongcheng had given him sleepless nights, for fear that the Son of Heaven, Li Jianting, would fly into a rage and seal off all their Fei clan’s properties. He promptly nodded in acknowledgment and waited under the sun.

It was murderously scorching at noon. A little less than an hour passed. The Marquis of Helian was sweating profusely from the heat. He did not dare to make any inquiry, but his heart was gradually sinking. Under the silent gazes of the eunuchs around him, he became aware of the new emperor’s disciplinary punishment.

“Your Lordship,” Fuman called out to him softly. “Why don’t you wait in the side hall first? It’s such a hot day.”

The Marquis of Helian squeezed out a smile with some difficulty. Wiping his sweat with his sleeve, he answered, “It’s fine.”

He was the one who made arrangements for the City of Yongcheng’s relief grains, so he could not absolve himself of responsibility when things went awry. If Li Jianting suspected him of colluding with the rebels, his head would definitely roll. As long as he could preserve his life, he would even be willing to kneel while waiting, let alone stand and wait.

The Marquis of Helian did not know how long it had been, but he felt as if there was a scalding hot iron plate stuck to his back. His face was ghastly pale, and he was perspiring an abnormally copious amount of sweat. His vision, too, was swimming. It was all by sheer willpower that he remained standing.

The beaded curtains swung slightly, and Fengquan leaned partially out of it to announce in a feminine manner, “Her Majesty is awake. All of you move quickly. Don’t hold Her Majesty up from dealing with government affairs.”

The eunuchs and palace maids waiting in attendance under the eaves entered with the basins in hand. Not long later, the Marquis of Helian heard his name. He lifted the hem of his robe and went up the steps to come before the hall. It was such a spinning blur before his aged eyes that he had no choice but to hold on to Fuman for support.

“Oh, dear me.” Fuman looked worried. “Your Lordship, what’s wrong?”

The Marquis of Helian felt so oppressively stifled in the chest that it made him nauseous. As it turned out, he was having a heatstroke. Li Jianting was waiting in the hall, so the Marquis of Helian hastily steadied himself on his feet, though both his legs were trembling somewhat. He could only murmur to Fuman, “It’s... It’s nothing.”

“There are basins of ice inside,” Fuman whispered to him. “Just in time for you to go in and alleviate the heat.”

The Marquis of Helian strode through the door and lowered his head before Li Jianting’s desk to kneel and pay his obeisance. His voice was weak and feeble. “This, this humble subject pays his respect to Your Majesty. Blessed is Your Majesty.”

Holding the memorial with her fingers, Li Jianting did not look up.

The Marquis of Helian prostrated himself, not daring to move. Even his breathing grew lighter. Very quickly, the sweat beside his forehead dampened his sleeves.

“I’ve seen from Liang Cuishan’s memorial that the Fei clan has encroached on the commoners’ fields in the City of Chuancheng.” Li Jianting took a sip of the cooled tea and continued in a gentle voice, “Do you know of this?”

The sweat all over the Marquis of Helian’s body from the heat turned into cold sweat. “This humble subject knows. The Chief Surveillance Bureau has impeached this humble subject, while the memorandum the Grand Secretariat issued has asked the officials from the Ministry of Justice to work in collaboration with those from the Ministry of Revenue to head over to Chuancheng to audit the field taxes. It even has Xue Xiuzhuo of the Court of Judicial Review act as an official to supervise and inspect.”

“The Ministry of Revenue is now saying that the Fei clan of Chuancheng is in cahoots with the Pan clan of Dancheng and the Han clan of Wucheng. You conspire to deceive the imperial court, embezzle the field taxes, and even inflict harsh punishments on the commoners in the cities, causing hundreds of people from Chuancheng to flee the city,” Li Jianting said. “Is that true?”

The Marquis of Helian was burning up inside with anxiety. Propping himself with hands on the ground, he took a few slight gasps and blurted in a moment of desperation, “This, this humble subject dares not...”

Li Jianting suddenly flung the memorial onto the Marquis of Helian’s body and said in a frosty tone, “You dare not? So you are saying no one in Chuancheng died of starvation in winter? You not only collude with the Pan clan, but also collaborate with the merchant of Juexi to use the Chuancheng commoners’ grains to ingratiate yourself with the rebels! Do you think I don’t know? Do you think the Grand Secretary is unaware? The imperial court has been watching the whole of you cancerous lot for a long time!”

The Marquis of Helian almost slumped to the ground, paralyzed. With tears in his eyes, he cried, “Your Majesty, Your Majesty! During the reign of Xiande, the Hua faction joined forces with the Pan faction to monopolize state power, and they had the Empress Dowager on the inside helping them. This humble subject had no choice but to do so in order to preserve the lives of my entire family!” He bowed his head and kowtowed, weeping loudly as he knocked his head against the ground. “The common folks of Chuancheng are just like my own sons. They have been under the charge of my Fei clan since the Great Imperial Ancestor<sup>67</sup> established and ruled the empire. If I had not been pushed to the end of my tether, how would I have dared to commit such an inhuman act?! As for the grains, Your Majesty, this humble subject saw how troubled Your Majesty was over the Yongcheng’s grains and could not help but feel anxious too, and that was how I fell for that traitor Shen's trap so easily!"

In the face of imminent death, the Marquis of Helian wised up and disavowed himself of involvement by not bringing up Yan Heru.

"Han Cheng acted tyrannically and coerced this humble subject numerous times to help him commit regicide and self-proclaimed himself king." The Marquis of Helian's face was awash in tears as he raised his head to look at Li Jianting. "But this humble subject is a court minister of the Li clan and could absolutely not throw in with him! That night during the banquet, this humble subject fought at the risk of my life to protect Your Majesty... This humble subject deserves punishment for my crime. I only ask of Your Majesty to spare my son and daughter in consideration of the Great Imperial Ancestor's great kindness..."

Li Jianting seemed to be moved. "In an act of kindness, the Great Imperial Ancestor handed the eight cities to you people. Yet you commit such a grave mistake for your own interests."

"This humble subject is deeply aware that my crime is deserving of death." The Marquis of Helian choked with sobs "...To be owing several tens of thousands in field taxes... This debt... Even if the Fei clan has only one person left standing, we will spare no effort to pay it back."

As long as Li Jianting did not kill the Marquis of Helian, he would not only be willing to return all the fertile fields, but also make up for the arrears in field taxes. The location of the City of Chuancheng was more special than the City of Dancheng. It was close to the City of Dicheng, connected to the waterways, and inextricably linked to Juexi, so he really might just be able to make up for this sum of money, but the Marquis of Helian was just like the rest of the wily old foxes from the other noble clans and did not say how long exactly it would take for this sum of field taxes to be fully paid up.

Li Jianting turned back, as if contemplating it over. After a time, she said, "Your crimes are unforgivable. On account that you were willing to help Yongcheng out of their predicament and that you still have a conscience, I shall spare your life."

The Marquis of Helian immediately felt relieved and hurriedly kowtowed. "Your Majesty is benevolent of heart..."

"However, you formed cliques for your own selfish ends, and you have failed the Great Imperial Ancestor for the favor he has shown you. The title ‘Marquis of Helian’ can be retained no more.” Without giving the Marquis of Helian a chance to gasp for breath, she continued, “And then there’s the matter of the encroachment of the commoners’ field.”

The Marquis of Helian’s heart leaped into his mouth again.

“Fuman,” Li Jianting said towards the door. “Drag those few lowlifes out.”

Fuman acknowledged his order. Not long later, the guards escorted several detained people to kneel in the open space before the hall. Propping himself up with his hands, The Marquis of Helian looked back through the beaded curtain and realized that all these people were the officials he himself had set up in the City of Chuancheng’s yamen.

“The Great Imperial Ancestor might have handed the eight cities to you people, but the eight cities still take after the surname ‘Li’. It is by virtue of my amnesty that you could escape the death penalty. These people deceive their superiors and subordinates, trample over the law, and commit all kinds of atrocities.” Li Jianting stood beside the Marquis of Helian and reached out a slender palm to pat him gently on the shoulder. “They caused the common folks in the territory to be forced into displacement. They deserve death. Fuman.”

Fuman raised his voice. “Flogging paddles in place—HIT!”

The moment the word left Fuman’s mouth, the iron-covered upright rods suddenly struck human flesh. The sound of it startled the Marquis of Helian so much that he trembled all over.

The few of them had their mouths stuffed. They were not dragged to the Gate of Duancheng in accordance with the flogging rules, nor were they wrapped in cotton-padded clothes. They were in their inner garment, their official robes having long been stripped off them. The paddle-wielding eunuchs were all old subordinates of the Eastern Depot, and they flogged with everything they had. A few floggings later, the few people were all a bloody mangle of flesh.

The Marquis of Helian’s ears were buzzing. Mingli Hall was very cool, giving him a chill all over. The sound of flogging continued, and one of them tilted his head back twice, the blood between his teeth soaking through the white fabric gag as he sobbed and whimpered at the Marquis of Helian. The entire Mingli Hall was extremely quiet, with the eunuchs all standing in solemn silence with their hands at their sides. Only the flogging sound of “thud, thud, thud” persisted.

After an hour, the acrid stench of blood pervaded the air.

Without looking at the Marquis of Helian again, Li Jianting said, “You may leave.”

The Marquis of Helian tripped over himself as he got up and fell back onto his knees on the cold, hard floor. Fuman signaled the junior eunuch with his eyes, and both of them hoisted up the Marquis of Helian to send him out. The Marquis of Helian’s boots stepped into the blood. He widened his eyes and looked at his feet.

The pool of blood reflected the Marquis of Helian’s official robe.

The Marquis of Helian staggered a few steps and felt the world spinning— so frightened was he that he literally passed out cold.

Li Jianting reclined in her chair. Through the dark shadow of the window, she could see Fuman ordering the guards to clear away the bodies on the ground.

Fengquan picked up the memorial that had been flung to the ground and said in a soft voice, “This scene is truly horrifying.”

“You have never seen a scene of carnage and bloodbath before.” Li Jianting’s eyes were hidden from view under the darkness. “When the epidemic ran rampant in the City of Dancheng, refugees crowded the entrance of Qudu, wanting to dig their way in through the ditches. Eventually, they clogged up the ditch, and the stench of corpses permeated all over... No one saved them. Now, that was a scene that was truly horrifying.”

Fengquan did not touch her desk and merely set the memorial back lightly.

“Tough times call for tough measures in governance.”<sup>68</sup> Li Jianting paused for a long time. “Let the Marquis of Helian live for a while longer. Has Xue Yanqing come looking for you recently?”

Fengquan bowed and answered, “He came to ask about Your Majesty’s daily routine.”

“Cen Xunyi is a long-time elder in the imperial court. He’s far-sighted in having misgivings about Zhongbo. I did not go along with what Xue Yanqing wanted this time,” Li Jianting said. “I ought to make it up to him.”

“His Excellency Xue had his hands clean of corrupted practices, and he lives frugally when he is in official residence. For that reason, he has quite the reputation in the Imperial College. If Your Majesty were to reward him with money and commonplace objects..." Fengquan lowered his eyes, and his voice gradually trailed off.

Li Jianting pondered it over for a moment. "Jiang Qingshan has made meritorious contributions in raising grains, and he treats the people like his sons. Let the Grand Secretary draft up a memorandum. I heard his wife, Liu, also has a reputation for being virtuous. Reward them together."

Jiang Qingshan was Xue Xiuzhuo's capable right-hand man in Juexi, so by rewarding him, she would be appeasing Xue Xiuzhuo. Besides, Li Jianting still had other uses for Jiang Qingshan. There was currently no one holding the Prince of Donglie, Qi Zhuyin, in check. The Qidong Garrison Troops, however, needed military provisions, and Li Jianting had the key to this granary placed in Jiang Qingshan's hands.

Fengquan acknowledged his order and retreated, taking particular caution as he did so.

"The new emperor has shown her mettle. This move of check and balance is indeed impressive." Xiao Chiye pushed aside the military affairs and read over the updates from Qudu again. "To pacify Xue Xiuzhuo, she rewarded Jiang Qingshan. She can intimidate Commander-in-chief Qi and at the same time, threaten Xue Xiuzhuo, who holds sway over the practical doers faction and the way the Imperial College blows."

"It has been so easy for Xue Xiuzhuo to bring on a change of emperor; she has to be on guard against him. Jiang Qingshan is a provincial governor who has never received the Li clan's favor during the reign of Xiande and Tianchen, and now he is going to enjoy a meteoric rise." Shen Zechuan set aside Yu Xiaozai's letter. "On the contrary, I do find her way of dealing with the Marquis of Helian unexpected."

"It is." Xiao Chiye looked opposite him. "She's got some guts."

Shen Zechuan had truly never expected Li Jianting to take the measure of flogging the corrupted officials to death to intimidate the Marquis of Helian. Dipping his brush in ink, he said, "I initially thought she would find an excuse to kill him. I never expected her to be able to hold herself back."

"The Marquis of Helian originally excused himself, saying that he had no money, and now he has been so frightened he's willing to make up for the deficit; he even gave up his manors." Xiao Chiye tilted his head back slightly as he slouched lazily in the chair. "The female emperor adopts a policy of both benevolence and intimidation and applies carrot and stick judiciously, which allows for more latitude than Xue Xiuzhuo, who would never let it rest. Seeing how she treats the Marquis of Helian, the noble clans, who have been beaten to this point, will certainly take the initiative to make up for the deficit in the hope of making amends for their transgressions in exchange for a slim chance of survival.”

What were the accounts the Grand Secretariat was investigating?
Fields and money.

If there had been no Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye in the equation, Li Jianting would perhaps go along with Xue Xiuzhuo’s way and stick it out to the very end. But she was unbelievably shrewd, and she understood the truth in Cen Yu’s words. Compared to dealing with the Eight Great Clans at this moment, Shen Zechuan was far more terrifying.

“How amazing.” Shen Zechuan held up the brush and traced Xiao Chiye’s eyes. “Now, this is a genuine emperor.”

“I never used to believe that a person is born to be an emperor, but she is indeed gifted and talented. She has resided in the inner compound for merely five years.” Xiao Chiye grasped hold of Shen Zechuan’s wrist across the table.

“—Want your reward?”

“I was in Zhaozui Temple for merely five years, too.” Shen Zechuan’s leg under the table kicked off its wooden clog and inched up along the side of Xiao Chiye’s leg. He loosened his grip, and the brush fell onto the table, leaving several oblique shadows among the papers.

Lanzhou bent a finger and pressed it down on the bridge of Xiao Chiye’s nose.

“Give it to me, quick.”

CHAPTER 262: SEPARATE WAYS

“If I do, I’m afraid your waist will break.” Xiao Chiye said with a ghost of a smile.

Although there had never been explicit instructions, Shen Zechuan had indeed injured his waist and could not stand up to the torment.

Shen Zechuan held back for a moment and was just about to put his leg back down, but Xiao Chiye did not permit him to. Instead, he grasped this ankle in his palm, pressing it against himself.

“Oh...” Shen Zechuan drew out the end of his words. “You want me to sate myself by feeding on fantasy, much like quenching my thirst by looking at plums.”

“It’s getting late.” Xiao Chiye said, but still, he did not let go.

Shen Zechuan initially still meant to say a word or two, but the hand grasping on to him suddenly began moving.

“If, before the ninth month, Commander-in-Chief Qi is still indisposed to deploy troops, I will not wait anymore.” Xiao Chiye’s attire was all in order, and nothing seemed amiss looking at his upper body. Even the way he spoke was no different from how it usually was.

“Given the means the emperor resorts to, she will not agree to the Commander-in-chief’s deployment of troops. Furthermore—” Shen Zechuan’s voice suddenly went soft, as if he had melted.

Xiao Chiye took off his clean sock.

There was still tablecloth hanging down around the table. Spurred along by the movements of Xiao Chiye’s palm, Shen Zechuan’s knees pressed gently against the table board. His bare, treading foot worked through the intricately decorative-patterned robe, and that fabric chafed against the underside of his foot, belying the hardness blanketed under the softness.

“Besides, Commander-in-chief Qi has to consider the Five Commanderies too.” Xiao Chiye picked up from where Lanzhou left off. “Penetrating deep into the desert takes time and effort. She has to weigh her priorities. Even Qi Shiyu might not necessarily be willing to go ahead with this battle if it drags on.”

The corner of Shen Zechuan’s eyes reddened, prompted by the tidal waves of heat. “You told General Lu the other day that you were going to wait for Qidong.”

“At that time, the emperor still had yet to show her mettle. Looking at it now, the chances of Qidong deploying troops is slim.” Xiao Chiye stopped teasing Lanzhou when he spoke to this point. “This year, you gathered grains from the four prefectures of Huaizhou, Chazhou, Cizhou, and Hezhou to resolve the dilemma of putting food on the table. Although we made it in time for the spring plowing, the Huaizhou granary is lost. Now that Tao Ming has fled, the imperial court will naturally have to send someone else to manage it. It’ll be hard to do business with them again next year. And with the Port of Yongyi and the Xi clan’s copper mines sealed, Libei’s mutual trade market business is going to fall by half. Lanzhou, we will not be able to afford to feed the Qidong Garrison Troops next year.”

Qudu did not give grains when Qidong dispatched troops to the Qingshu Tribe this time, but Qi Zhuyin still had confidence. But where had her confidence come from? Other than Shen Zechuan, who else was there in the world who could be so generous as to supply a garrison troop the military grains they needed? Xue Xiuzhuo was not a fool. He was well aware of who had given the garrison troops their grains. He just did not expose it right to Qi Zhuyin’s face.

As Qidong had deployed troops to assist external forces this year, the military fields of three out of five commanderies had no one to farm the land, so it was inevitable that the harvest from military farming would suffer a drop. This, in turn, resulted in Qi Zhuyin’s military provisions needs this year being even higher than the previous years. The only thing worth rejoicing was that the spring plowing of four commanderies’ commoners’ fields was proceeding as usual, so she only had to worry about the grains for the army. But even so, the military grain expenditure for 300,000 soldiers was frightfully immense. And this had yet to take into consideration the invasion deep into the desert, which was a completely different matter from her leading troops to launch a surprise attack.

After the victory of the Duanzhou battle, the expenditure for fortifications and defenses in the various prefectures was bound to skyrocket. Not only that, the six prefectures were already beginning to take shape. Shen Zechuan had to supply year-round military provisions to the 120,000 garrison troops of the six prefectures, as well as continue to supply military provisions to Libei's 120,000 Armored Cavalry. Add the Qidong Garrison Troops to the equation, and the burden of supporting a grand total of 540,000 troops and horses would all fall upon him.

"Wang Xian wrote to me and said that he sent you a letter half a month ago, in which he elaborated on the stakes involved." Xiao Chiye switched to a more comfortable posture. "You didn't reply."

The underside of Shen Zechuan's foot was still sticking to Xiao Chiye's bulging and erect member. Leaning against the chair, he said, "The advisors had yet to draw up an estimate for a budget half a month ago, so I put a hold on Wang Xian's letter and did not reply."

"The advisors in residence are good, but they are mostly from the countryside. They are talented, but they are not as well-versed in the trade as officials like Wang Xian. Wang Xian served as the Secretary for the Ministry of Revenue and often engaged with the Ministry of War. Every year, he has to deal with us military officers who enter the capital to ask for our money and grains. He is well-acquainted with the various regions' military expenditures and military grains needs." Xiao Chiye had been resting at home of late, and the issue that had been on his mind the most was the military provisions too.

It was all too wonderful for the three armies to join forces as one, but it was also too difficult.

The equipment of the Libei Armored Cavalry wore out too fast, and the back-end squad still had to bring along the military craftsmen when they were transporting military provisions. Once the convoy squad stepped out of the battle zone, there was no more bridle path for them to take further east. The barren sands of the Gobi desert were all the Twelve Tribes' territories, so they had to increase the numbers of troops for the transportation of military provisions as a protective measure, but increasing manpower meant increasing military grains. The farther away the Libei

Armored Cavalry went, the more grains they would consume. Then, there was also the need to plan for all possible contingencies that might happen along the way. This was much harder than fighting a defensive battle.

“Last year, Xue Xiuzhuo abandoned the City of Quancheng and Luoxia Pass to defend the thirteen cities of Juexi alone. At that time, it didn’t feel all that impressive.” Finally looking awkward, Shen Zechuan sighed. “Only now do I know just how impressive it was.”

Who did not want Qi Zhuyin’s military strength? Shen Zechuan wanted it too. He only had to take down the Qidong Five Commanderies, and it would be impossible for Qudu to turn the tide in their favor even if the current emperor was Emperor Guangcheng himself. All along, Xue Xiuzhuo had been indifferent to Zhongbo and Libei’s battles. He let Shen Zechuan recruit soldiers and buy horses at the beginning of the year and did not even pursue the matter of Qidong’s military grains. This was all another way of wearing Shen Zechuan down.

“Jiang Qingshan is truly a great help. No wonder the emperor wanted to use him to contest Xue Xiuzhuo. This person shouldered the responsibility for the Dazhou granaries all alone with just his unyielding dauntlessness.” The expression in Xiao Chiye’s eyes was deep and penetrating. “Lanzhou, the battle you are going to fight is even harder than mine.”

Shen Zechuan did not reply to Wang Xian’s letter in consideration of Xiao Chiye. Similarly, Xiao Chiye was also now giving up on the Qidong Garrison Troops in consideration for Shen Zechuan.

Xiao Chiye shifted the chair away and bent over to pick up the wooden clogs. However, he did not put them on for Shen Zechuan, but set them aside neatly. He released his grip on Shen Zechuan’s hand and leaned over to stroke Shen Zechuan’s cheeks, whispering, “I’ll go by myself.”

The corners of Shen Zechuan’s eyes reddened, but there was no surge of passion in those expressive eyes of his.

The watchman’s clapper struck a few times late into the night. Hugging his legs close to him, Fengquan leaned against the foot of Li Jianting’s bed. He did not fall asleep, however. After a little less than an hour, he heard Li Jianting say from within the lowered drapes, “Aren’t you going to sleep?”

Resting his chin on his knees such that one side of his delicate, refined face was buried, Fengquan answered, “Your Majesty has had difficulty sleeping for several days. We should summon an imperial physician.”

With her eyes open, Li Jianting turned slightly to the side so that her back was to the lowered drapes. "I'm just not used to sleeping here."

Silence descended in the palace interior for a moment.

"Have you seen Shen Zechuan before?" Li Jianting asked.

"I saw him during the reign of Xiande when he had just emerged from Zhaozui Temple."

"Rumors have it that his mother was a dancer from Duanzhou." Li Jianting seemed to be seeking confirmation. "Is this true?"

"Yes, it's true." Fengquan moved his numbed legs. "He's the eighth son of Shen Wei, born of common birth. He was not a favored child in the Prince of Jianxing's manor, and was sent away to a private residence in Duanzhou very early on. He has relations with Ji Gang, the former Vice Commander of the Imperial Bodyguards. When Duanzhou fell into the enemies' hand, he was in the Chashi Sinkhole too."

After a moment of silence, Li Jianting said, "Qi Huilian is a veritable extremist to dare to cast aside his prejudices to impart all he had to him without reservation."

"But Shen Zechuan is small-minded and vindictive." Fengquan turned his head to the side. "Ji Lei had a feud with him, and so he made Ji Lei... suffer a fate worse than death. If Han Cheng had not been so thick-headed to keep resisting that day at the banquet, Your Majesty could very well dismiss him from his position and send him into exile in Zhongbo to see how Shen Zechuan treats him. No doubt he will also make Han Cheng wish he were better off dead."

The shadows of the trees outside the windows fell upon the ground. The palace in the dead of night was silent and totally devoid of human voices.

"You are Mu Ru's younger brother by blood?" Li Jianting changed the topic.

Fengquan's expression cracked a little, but he did not reply rashly.

"You became a eunuch before Mu Ru entered the palace. At that time, she was already Prince Chu's favored concubine. Why did you have to enter the palace to suffer?" Li Jianting's eyes turned slightly. "You are not like Fuman, who has been to the Eunuch School, but you are well-versed in the classics. Given Mu Ru's family background, being able to read is already not bad."

Fengquan immediately knelt on the ground. "This humble slave, this humble slave..."

“I can see that both of your ears aren’t newly pierced, but the former emperor has never rewarded you with ear ornaments, and it’s highly unlikely for him to do so. Those who can wear pearl or gem earrings at an early age are either of lawful birth or noble blood. So, where...” Li Jianting propped herself up and paused for a moment before looking at the lowered drapes, “...exactly are you from?”

The zither strings jolted with a hum. Looking as if he had just woken up from a dream, Qiao Tianya raised his hand with the intent to rub the center of his forehead, only to realize that the skin on the pulp of his finger was torn.

“The fact that Commander-in-chief Qi has yet to reply means that she’s displeased with His Lordship for wanting to hand the Qingshu Tribe’s territory over to Hairigu...” Yao Wenyu stopped talking and looked into the inner chamber through the drapes.

“This matter is a tough one to deal with. The fear is creating a rift with Qidong.” Kong Ling followed Yao Wenyu’s gaze. “Songyue has been restless. Why not come out and have tea with us?”

Qiao Tianya wiped the bit of blood off with his thumb and leaned back in the rattan chair. With a smile, he said, “Since it is at your invitation, I shall respectfully comply.”

With that, he set the zither on the table, rose to lift the curtain, and stepped out.

The weather was fine today, and a tea table had been set up under the eaves. They did not seem to be discussing official business, but more like sampling tea. Yao Wenyu was dressed in a green robe with wide sleeves, and when he drank his tea, the red thread appeared ever so imperceptibly.

Qiao Tianya did not stand on ceremony and sat down on the chair beside Yuanzhuo.

“What fine tea is it?” Qiao Tianya accepted the tea Gao Zhongxiong handed to him. He took only a sniff before saying, “Oh, the ‘Height of Spring’ from Hezhou.”

“Don’t be misled by how he’s no different from a general, always astride his horse wielding his blade.” Kong Ling pointed at Qiao Tianya. “He is, in fact, a tea connoisseur.”

“Make merry to the fullest while the going is good.” Qiao Tianya sipped his tea. “If I had money, I’d want to satisfy my appetite to dine and wine. As long as I can sample all the fine tea and fine wines, I'd be happy to spend the money regardless of the cost."

With his eyes lowered, Yao Wenyu said, "You should learn from Shenwei."

Gao Zhongxiong hurriedly waved his hands. "On the contrary, I envy Commander Qiao. Me, I just want to save up money to build up the family finances so that I can marry a virtuous wife when the world is at peace."

"Songyue isn't married either," Kong Ling asked. "Don't you feel anxious to do so?"

"Look at Old Fei the Tenth. He's not married either, is he? They are in no hurry, but of course, I'm burning with anxiety." Qiao Tianya set down the teacup and said with a straight face, "I've been wanting to earn this sum of gift money<sup>69</sup> so much I have been tossing and turning all night."

The various gentlemen burst into laughter.

Qiao Tianya turned his face to the side to look at Yao Wenyu. "Mister isn't married, either. Any urgency to?"

The flowers on the branch fell amongst Yao Wenyu's sleeves. He turned his gaze to meet Qiao Tianya's eyes. When the wind blew off the flowers, it also sent a waft of his slightly bitter medicinal scent over to Qiao Tianya.

"Used to," Yao Wenyu answered. "But it doesn't matter now that I have Hunu."

Other than Qiao Tianya, everyone present did not know much about Yao Wenyu and the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue. They had only heard rumors that the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue wanted to marry him, so naturally, they thought he was referring to her.

"If you ask me, there are three regrets in life. Not being born as Hunu is one of them." Qiao Tianya moved to hug Hunu, but grasped hold of Yao Wenyu's wrist behind Hunu's plump body. "Or I could have rested all day and night on your lap, fantasizing to infinity and beyond even in my dreams."

Yao Wenyu's expression shifted slightly. He did not expect Qiao Tianya to be so gutsy, and in his fluster, he started to cough.

"Commander Qiao often surprises one with his words. It'd be wonderful if he could engage in a philosophical discourse<sup>70</sup> with Yuanzhuo." Gao Zhongxiong sighed with emotion. "I wonder if I will ever have the chance to see Yuanzhuo's literary grace on full display."

“Philosophical discourses that are mere rhetoric are detrimental to the state.” Yao Wenyu raised his hand to cover his mouth. His wrist was a little red. “I have yet to finish my words from earlier. Commander-in-chief’s lack of reply means she’s displeased with Hairigu. When all is said and done, we were not the ones who fought and took down the Qingshu Tribe territory, so we can’t force the issue.”

Kong Ling nodded. “I’m worried that Commander-in-chief Qi might bear ill will towards His Lordship because of this.”

“We want to leverage their military force to fight another, but Hairigu is a Biansha Scorpion, after all. It’s only reasonable for the Commander-in-chief Qi not to trust him.”

“This is only part of it.” Kong Ling exchanged glances with Yao Wenyu and slowly shook his head. “The worst fear is Commander-in-chief Qi suspecting His Lordship of threatening Qidong with this move.”

“The Qingshu Tribe lies close to the Bianjun Commandery,” Yao Wenyu said. “Even if Commander-in-chief Qi doesn’t think so, the various generals of Qidong will. They have had enough of being held under duress by the army-inspecting eunuch of Qudu. No doubt they will not agree to let the Scorpions keep a close watch on them again.”

“If Qidong isn’t willing,” Kong Ling said, “then all we can do is to make other plans.”

A candle was lit in the military tent. Qi Zhuyin sat with a leg propped as she squeezed her neck and listened to Qi Wei speak.

“Tell Lu Guangbai to stop sending letters. He indeed doesn’t have the burden of military supplies, and his 20,000 infantry soldiers can leave at just the drop of a hat.” She stared at the top of the tent. “Even Jiming and Xiao Chiye have never brought this matter up again.”

“General Lu has served under the Commander-in-chief for the longest time,” Qi Wei said. “He knows of your capabilities, so it’s only natural for him to want to persuade you to deploy troops.”

“I understand his desire to fight the Biansha Cavalry.” Qi Zhuyin frowned slightly. “But Dazhou has never gone deep into the desert. It’s a long journey to make, and danger lurks all around. Once all the three armies have been mobilized, who is going to ensure the safety of the encampments? The Scorpion in Qudu is still around.”

Qi Wei knew of the spot Qi Zhuyin was in. After hesitating for a moment, he said, "If you were to reject them at this moment, I fear you will earn the infamy of forsaking your integrity for gains."

No sooner had Qudu conferred her the title of Prince of Donglie than she turned against Zhongbo and Libei while the garrison troops were still eating Shen Zechuan's grains. Anyone who caught word of this would be inclined to condemn her.

Qi Zhuyin couldn't care less. "As they wish. There is nothing in the world you can't control more than wagging tongues."

"This account is tough to square off. In Zhongbo's view, their giving of grains to feed the garrison troops is an act of great kindness," Qi Wei said. "But if weren't for the war in Libei being at a critical point and Zhongbo needing us to mobilize troops to go to their aid when their gates were breached, Shen Zechuan's grains would not have come this easily either."

"They are people who scheme for world domination. They know how to grasp the opportunity." Qi Zhuyin's side profile was serious. There was no trace of her usual cheeky smile. "I was helping myself by helping Libei, and now, I'm also helping myself by not deploying troops. Qidong and Libei are brothers who go through adversities together, but the crisis in Libei has already been quelled, and Ce'an's desire to continue pushing further in will smack of militarism. Refugees abound after the empire started disintegrating. The wars this year and last year were inevitable. I know Amu'er is already showing signs of fatigue, and this is an excellent time to crush the alliance of the six tribes. But the eight cities' granaries are empty, and commoners are dying on the streets. The city of Yongcheng in Juexi is hit with a drought, and yet Jiang Qingshan still has to do his best to supply grains to Qudu and Qidong after autumn. These grains all had to be taken from the people. Of Shen Zechuan's six prefectures, three have yet to reach the bumper harvest year, so he also has to rely on the granaries in Hezhou... It's exhilarating to be fighting a battle, but I can't go."

Amu'er was an exceptional man, and the six tribes of Biansha were the bane of Dazhou's generals. If they were to emerge victorious after penetrating deep into the desert this time, then no matter who was to rule the state in the future, the names of the Libei Armored Cavalry and Xiao Chiye would go down in history. And besides, as a general, who would not want to pit themselves against such an opponent?

Qi Zhuyin snuffed out the candle wick, and the interior of the tent plunged into darkness. She sat for a moment, then said, “I voice it out; you write it down. Tell Shen Zechuan that even if the Qingshu Tribe’s territory were to fall into disuse, I will not permit Hairigu to set foot on it. Next, tell Xiao Jiming that I, Qi Zhuyin, may be acquainted with him since our youth and see him as a bosom friend, but my Qi clan is still a subject of Dazhou. Fighting against foreign foes together is my duty, but empowering Zhongbo is treason. And finally, tell Lu Guangbai, I wish him great success in his military exploits and in seeking redress for his previous humiliation, but this time, us siblings<sup>71</sup> will longer be going the same way.”

A solitary lone goose cried at the moon as it flew across the horizon of the Bianjun Commandery. Qi Wei put the respective letters away and turned to step out of the tent. Yellow sand rustled under those military boots, and a palm grabbed up a handful of the yellow sand. Lu Guangbai had his back to the dusky sky, the letter from Qidong still between his fingers. He squatted for a while, then put the letter away.

The sand in his palm trickled back to the ground.

Commander-in-chief Qi, treat this letter as you would me in person.<sup>72</sup>

In dereliction of duty, I left the commandery without due authorization, and for that, I have failed the elders of Qidong. Unless I step onto the battlefield and slay the enemies, my aspirations will never be realized. I will always be a general subordinate to Commander-in-chief Qi. We may not be able to tread the same path and fight together this battle, but the moon shines bright over the lands of the country. I will not let Commander-in-chief Qi down.

Credits: Thank you Ami and Suika for the brainwave, and daisiesfordaze for spotting the typo.

CHAPTER 263: LAOHU (TANTAI HU)

In the eighth month, the autumn harvest was sent to the granaries. Acting on Shen Zechuan's orders, Wang Xian went on an inspection tour with Yu Xiaozai to the six prefecture granaries, where he organized Zhongbo's grains and had the details recorded into books for submission to Duanzhou. The horse carriage crushed over the gravel. All donned in a round-collared robe,<sup>73</sup> Wang Xian watched through the window as the City of Duanzhou grew gradually closer.

"The moat is still under construction, but the city gates are all repaired." Yu Xiaozai pointed out to Wang Xian. "Brother Minshen, this is where His Lordship defended the city."

Wang Xian nodded and wiped the sweat from his forehead.

When Yu Xiaozai was still in Qudu, he had some contact with Wang Xian, but owing to the different nature of their duties, he had merely a nodding acquaintance with him. It was not until the seventh month, when they worked together, that they really became familiar with one another. He said comfortingly, "His Lordship treats others with magnanimity. Since he is willing to use you, it means he is willing to trust you. There is no need for you to keep dwelling on what happened in the past."

Wang Xian said with a bitter smile. "I was relegated from the capital and exiled to Zhongbo. If not for Second Master looking out for me, my head would have already rolled. I'm beyond grateful to His Lordship for letting bygones be bygones, so how would I still bear grudges? I'm just afraid that I'd be too inarticulate to answer in the hall later."

Yu Xiaozai knew of Wang Xian's misgivings. After pondering it over, he said, "Brother Minshen, look at me. I came to Zhongbo at the behest of my teacher, Censor-in-chief Cen, to negotiate peace with His Lordship. The talks later failed, and returning to Qudu was no longer an option. I initially thought of buying a few mu<sup>74</sup> of fertile lands in Zhongbo and becoming a commoner from then on, but His Lordship promoted me, making me a 'Surveillance Commissioner' of Zhongbo. Brother Minshen was demoted and relegated because you were caught in the crossfire of Second Master's bribery case and framed by Fu LinYE and those people. Second Master is a man who values ties, and he has always remembered this incident. This time, Brother Minshen successfully prepared Libei's military grains without taking the credits. Whether for official or personal reasons, His Lordship will not make things difficult for Brother Minshen."

Feeling slightly relieved, Wang Xian waved his hand and said, "My contribution is too insignificant to be worth mentioning."

The horse carriage arrived at their destination and passed through the overhanging gate that had been lowered. Both of them got off the carriage one after another and saw Fei Sheng, who was waiting at the entrance of the passageway.

"Both excellencies are fatigued from the long journey. Please go in first." Fei Sheng led both of them inside. "His Lordship has prepared a banquet to welcome both excellencies at the residence."

Slightly surprised, Wang Xian said, "This humble subordinate is merely following orders. How am I deserving of such favor from His Lordship?"

"Don't worry about it," Yu Xiaozai said with a smile. "His Lordship is never extravagant when he hosts feasts. It's just some common dishes over an invitation of wine and tea."

"Wang Xian is swift and efficient in making arrangements for the military grains." Shen Zechuan turned his head to the side and said to Xiao Chiye behind him. "What's even rarer is that he is able to successfully negotiate with the yamen of the various prefectures. It's too gross an injustice to put him in Chazhou."

Xiao Chiye secured the bandage for Shen Zechuan and said, "He could even drag out and stall my account, so of course he's also in his element dealing with the various prefectures' yamen."

Shen Zechuan sucked in a slight breath at Xiao Chiye's movements. "The tyrant of Qudu is going to break my waist."

"This waist," Xiao Chiye sized it up and brought his palms around to the front to lead Shen Zechuan back to his own chest, "is so slender it looks like it's within my grasp."<sup>75</sup>

"That's why there is the saying 'shen yao pan bin'—'slender of frame and graying of temples'."<sup>76</sup> Shen Zechuan's back clung against Xiao Chiye's chest. "So, envy not, my beloved—Xiao-lang."<sup>77</sup>

"In any case, it's all mine," Xiao Chiye said. "The only ones doing the envying here are the others."

Jiran, who was under the eaves, watched as the maidservants entered and exited. Putting his palms together, he tilted his head and said to Ding Tao, "We have a guest."

There was more to this little monk's words than meets the ear. Ding Tao folded his arms and answered in great understanding. "You will still get your vegetarian dishes. His Lordship has given the instructions earlier."

Jiran immediately showed a delighted expression. "Anitabha,<sup>78</sup> Ding Tao-gege, you're so much smarter than the fishes in the pond!"

Shen Zechuan, who had been in the principal room, had already stepped out. Preparation was all in order in the side hall, and the various gentlemen had already all taken their seats. When Wang Xian and Yu Xiaozai arrived, they first paid their obeisances to the Prefectural Lord before exchanging pleasantries with the gentlemen at the table.

"The depositing of grains in the six prefectures is a major event of utmost importance for the entire year," Shen Zechuan said. "Youjing and Minshen have worked hard."

During the autumn harvest in the eighth month, the various regions would sort out the grains and put them into storage at the granaries. Following right after in the ninth month, they would calculate the surplus grain reserves in all localities to prepare for the winter. Going by Zhongbo's process, there was no way Libei's military grains could be prepared this fast, but Wang Xian had been making preparations as early as the sixth month. Once the defensive battle in Duanzhou was over, he asked the garrison troops of the various prefectures to allocate manpower to start harvesting the grains. They made it in time for the lull in the eighth month, giving the six prefectures that were about to supply military grains time to catch their breath.

Wang Xian hurriedly stood up to bow in return. "This humble subordinate was just following orders. It is all due to His Lordship's foresight."

"I heard Tantai Hu vented his anger on you?" Xiao Chiye, having not moved his chopsticks yet, said to Wang Xian with a smile.

"General Tantai is concerned about the war, so it's only natural for him to ask about the preparations. We had a pleasant talk in Dunzhou." Wang Xian knew that Tantai Hu was chosen by Xiao Chiye to head down to Dunzhou. He had military merits to his name, and he was also in the position to get his say in before Shen Zechuan, so of course Wang Xian could not offend him. "Those rumors are not to be believed."

Looks like this incident had really taken place.

This was not the first time Tantai Hu had clashed with the civil officials. He was impatient by nature, and he was Xiao Chiye's trusted aide. While in Dunzhou, he and the yamen functionaries could still mutually tolerate each other at first. His military reports were submitted directly to Shen Zechuan's desk, and he had no need to be supervised by the yamen. By all logic, there should not have been conflicts between both parties. However, the Dunzhou Garrison Troops, having been rewarded several times, boasted of being a branch of the Imperial Army. By the time of the Duanzhou battle, they were reveling in the height of their glory among the six prefectures' garrison troops. The preparations of military grains were a matter between Wang Xian and the various prefectures' Tax Circuit Intendants,<sup>79</sup> and despite that, Tantai Hu dared to interfere and concern himself with it.

When peace reigned in the world, discord between generals and ministers merely meant that they could not work together, but in times of turmoil, dissension was a critical issue that could affect the overall situation.

Kong Ling, being the insightful person he was, stepped forth to smooth things over. "General Tantai comes from the Imperial Army, and he has gone through thick and thin together with Libei. Long when Second Master decided to fight the Twelve Tribes, he had discussed with me the issue of military grains. Your Lordship, General Tantai has deployed troops to come to the rescue several times, so he's naturally more attentive when it comes to the military grains." He turned his head aside to smile at Yao Wenyu.

“Yuanzhuo and I often ask about the fortification of the city walls too after the fright we got from the defensive battle.”

The gentlemen laughed at this, and the atmosphere eased a little.

Yao Wenyu then said to Wang Xian, “Brother Minshen once served as the Ministry of Revenue Secretary. Censor-in-chief Cen often praised Brother Minshen for being efficient in his work, and it can indeed be seen from the preparation of military grains just how extraordinary Brother Minshen’s capabilities are.”

Yao Wenyu’s words were partially true. Wang Xian was indeed capable, but he was not that conspicuous. Xue Xiuzhuo, who often had dealings with the Ministry of Revenue at that time, was in Hai Liangyi’s good graces more. In addition, the Ministry of Revenue had always been under the control of the noble clans. So even when the Ministry of Personnel wanted to promote Wang Xian after taking the imperial censors’ testimonials into consideration, they could not manage to do so. But even if what he said was not true, Yao Wenyu had still accorded him the respect he was due.

Wang Xian had been an official in the capital for a long time, so how could he not understand? Yao Wenyu’s intent was Shen Zechuan’s intent. Since Yao Wenyu was willing to speak up to placate him, then he should leave it at that. The incident had already been made known, and His Lordship and Second Master would naturally have their own follow-up arrangements.

Wang Xian bowed. “How would I dare to accept praise from Yuanzhuo? This humble subordinate is truly unworthy.” With this, he relaxed a little and continued, “As for the military grains, this humble subordinate still needs General Tantai’s advice in certain aspects. Fortunately, the General did not mind and carefully analyzed the pros and cons with me. To tell Your Lordship and Second Master the truth, this humble subordinate might have managed all that relates to the military grains back in Qudu, but when all is said and done, I’ve never handled supplies over a long distance. It was all General Tantai who advised me in detail on issues such as the consumption of grain wagons and the increase and decrease of military supplies.”

Kong Ling cast a glance at Zhou Gui, who was a short distance away, and inwardly lamented with a sigh, as expected from an official from the capital; smart and perceptive, he can get his message across in much fewer words.

Zhou Gui was also here regarding the preparations of military grains, although he had arrived several days before Wang Xian and Yu Xiaozai. At present, he was sitting in his seat listening carefully to the conversations, finding this Wang Xian to be measured in his conduct and tactful with his words. He could not understand why Chengfeng was looking at him.

They discussed a little more about official matters, and Shen Zechuan then invited Wang Xian to take a seat, thereby signaling the start of the feast.

When they returned to their room at night, Xiao Chiye slipped out of his clothes, his expression one of displeasure.

Shen Zechuan spoke as he switched out of his shoes. “You know how Laohu is; he’s not one to become arrogant because of his achievements.”

Xiao Chiye was still in the midst of disrobing. “The Dunzhou garrison troops are all soldiers recruited from the two prefectures of Fanzhou and Dengzhou, and there are a number of bandits among them. It will not bode well if military discipline is lacking.”

Shen Zechuan saw the candlelight reflected on the side of the wolf on Xiao Chiye’s back, looking very awe-inspiring indeed, so he stretched out a finger and poked it.

Xiao Chiye backhandedly grabbed hold of it and gave it a squeeze. He continued, “I know Laohu will not get all puffed up with his achievements, but the fear is that he might get egged on by others to have the Dunzhou Garrison Troops emulate the Imperial Army.”

The Imperial Army was a slippery bunch who only knew to skive on the job, but that was only when there was nothing else going on. When there was really a war impending, they were the first to draw their blade and charge onto the battlefield. The Imperial Army dared to play the ruffian because they were not ruffians at all. All the 20,000 men were soldiers that Xiao Chiye went to great lengths to select. They were all from proper military households,<sup>80</sup> and they were naturally a leg above the others when trained. The original batch of soldiers from the Imperial Army in Qudu were once given the cold shoulder, and that had built up their strength of character. They knew when to go all out and when to pull back, and that was definitely not something the Dunzhou Garrison Troops and the like would be able to do anytime soon.

“This time, I’ll lead the Libei Armored Cavalry to advance from the east. If Qudu plans to seize the opportunity to attack Zhongbo,” Xiao Chiye turned back, “the Dunzhou Garrison Troops are all that you will have to rely on.”

Yin Chang’s death in battle was undoubtedly a heavy blow. The Cizhou Garrison Troops that were just beginning to take shape now needed a new commander, but scouting for a suitable candidate took time. The Duanzhou Garrison Troops had taken a beating and suffered casualties, while the Fanzhou and Dengzhou Garrison Troops had only been recently established. The only ones that could be truly put to use were the Dunzhou Garrison Troops and Imperial Cavalry, and even then, the Imperial Cavalry were low in numbers.

“Tantai Long could die for Dunzhou, and so can Tantai Hu.” Shen Zechuan tilted his head up to look at Xiao Chiye. “Don’t worry about the rear as you advance eastward. I naturally have my own means.”

“The Eight Great Training Divisions often carry the reputation for being incompetent, but Han Cheng is now dead, and the new viceroy is still unknown.” Xiao Chiye’s eyes betrayed his worry. “If Xue Xiuzhuo has a good candidate...”

Without the vise grip of the noble clan, the Eight Great Training Divisions could re-recruit.

“I’ll leave 5,000 Imperial Army soldiers to you,” Xiao Chiye said.

Several days later, Tantai Hu hurried to Duanzhou as he was ordered to. The moment he stepped into the residence, he fell to his knees before Xiao Chiye.

“Master...”

Tantai Hu had yet to say his piece when Xiao Chiye said, “You are now His Lordship’s general.”

Tantai Hu lowered his head and changed his tune. “Second Master! Did some shitty official lodge a complaint against me here? They came into the territory to prepare military grains and still wanted to audit Dunzhou’s grains and land tax ledgers. Wang Xian accused my Dunzhou Garrison Troops of squandering public funds right in front of so many people in the yamen!” He raised his head in indignation. “Second Master, of the garrison troops in the six prefectures, our Dunzhou Garrison Troops is the one that can provide timely assistance. In order to fight the Biansha baldies, we provide reinforcements all around, so our military expenditure will definitely be much higher than others! Does he have to go harping on and on and on about this? His Lordship is aware of this too!”

With one arm propped up on his knee, Xiao Chiye leaned sideways as he turned his thumb ring and said nothing in reply.

Chen Yang, who was waiting in attendance at the side, signaled to Tantai Hu with his eyes several times, but the latter refused to look at Chen Yang at all.

Tantai Hu knew what Xiao Chiye’s temper was like, but he was furious deep down. Forcing his anger down, he continued, “If Wang Xian has something to say, then say it to my face! Why stoop so low to frame me behind my back? What’s the fucking difference between him and those officials shamelessly currying favors for personal gains in Qudu? He said I squander public funds. Bah! And what about him wasting grains in Chazhou with Luo Mu?!”

“You find it a gross injustice.” Xiao Chiye raised his eyes.

Tantai Hu saw Xiao Chiye’s expression and could not help but feel a lump in his throat. “I brave untold dangers with Second Master, so how can they trample over me like this?! His Lordship knows of the account too, yet he doesn’t reprimand that Wang Xian. I, I can’t take it lying down!”

“You can’t take it lying down?” Xiao Chiye said in a sudden, frosty tone. “And so you had someone oust Wang Xian from the yamen? Is that your area of jurisdiction? When I transferred you to Dunzhou, Lanzhou made it clear that the civil administration doesn’t outrank you, and likewise, you don’t outrank them either!”

Tantai Hu’s chest heaved. “Even so, he can’t speak that way and cause the brothers under my command to be disillusioned!”

“I’ve looked through the accounts of the Dunzhou Garrison Troops. After the battle in Duanzhou, you transferred troops back to the city and did nothing else but first call together the local gentry to wine and feast.” Xiao Chiye’s expression was gloomily somber. “The money for the open banquet where guests are served as they arrive comes from Dunzhou’s public funds. How very impressive of you, Tantai Hu. His Lordship rewarded the Dunzhou Garrison Troops handsomely back in Duanzhou, but you know not to be content, and you even have to slap your own face in an attempt to impress beyond your means<sup>81</sup> by rewarding the soldiers with a feast. If you ask me, you’re the one who disillusioned me more!”

“Look at how easy it was for Yin Chang to take down Fanzhou back then. When the Cizhou Garrison Troops returned, His Lordship hosted a banquet to reward them, but when it came to the Dunzhou Garrison Troops, we only get a monetary reward.” Tantai Hu forced his voice down. “Second Master, can several taels of silver buy the lives of my brothers? It’s on behalf of His Lordship that I’m—”

Xiao Chiye abruptly jolted to his feet, and his shadow instantly enveloped Tantai Hu.

“Second Master!” Chen Yang dropped to his knees with a thud. “He’s simple-minded, and he indeed did it just for that meal! Nevertheless, squandering state funds is wrong of him. Second Master may just punish him!”

The freedom that Shen Zechuan gave to Tantai Hu was an act of kindness, but Tantai Hu could not hold this kindness hostage to make demands. Today, he dared to take the decision in his own hands because of his discontent, so he could very well disregard His Lordship and overstep his authority to take action tomorrow. He had several conflicts with the civil officials several times, and each time, Shen Zechuan had suppressed it without so much as a word, all in consideration for Xiao Chiye.

Tantai Hu knew he had misspoke out of turn in his desperation. He kept his head lowered, but could not bring himself to plead for mercy.

“Give him the ledger of the sealed granary in Dunzhou.” Xiao Chiye held up Langli Blade and wore it at the side of his waist. “Let him see this piece of land that Tantai Long defended with his life.”

Chen Yang took down the ledger and presented it before Tantai Hu.

“Your soldiers,” Xiao Chiye stressed these two words, “could eat well because the commoners of Cizhou and Dunzhou tightened their belts to make every money and every grain count. There are all kinds of delicacies at the open banquet, but my Lanzhou, in his sickness, is still eating wild vegetables from Duanzhou with the various advisors.”

Tantai Hu looked at that ledger book in detail, and his eyes could not help but reddened. He had realized the errors of his ways, although he still attempted to argue, “The granaries were in abundance the last I saw them in Dunzhou...”

Xiao Chiye whistled, raised an arm to receive Meng, and left without so much as a look back.

Credits: Thank you fukixie, AliceLiddell, and MaruChan for pointing out the wonky footnote and typo! <3

◇ CHAPTER 264: SHAO CLAN ◇

The preparations for the military expedition concluded at the beginning of the ninth month, and Chen Yang and Guo Weili set off first together with the army provisions. The bridleway at Mount Luo, having already been restored, led the Zhongbo grain wagons directly from Dunzhou to Mount Luo and then from Mount Luo to the Shasan Camp. Large numbers of troops from the various camps were mobilized, with Zuo Qianqiu and Zhao Hui stationed at Shayi and Sha'er Camps for defense. This time, Xiao Chiye took with him 90,000 elites from Libei.

“You are shouldering the army provisions alone this time.” There were no traces of Xiao Jiming’s illness to be seen from the way he was all neatly dressed in his regular wear. He looked far into the distance at Hongyan Mountains. “When A-Ye returns in triumph, Libei shall have to give our proper thanks to Zhongbo.”

“Amu’er has wild ambitions. If we don’t wipe him out in one fell swoop, he will still stage a comeback again in the future, and when that time comes, Duanzhou will be the first to bear the brunt of his attacks. This punitive expedition is also for Zhongbo’s sake.” Shen Zechuan turned aside. “Furthermore, the tenth month is when the common folks have the spare time to supplement their family expenses and when the six prefectures can focus on the construction of fortifications. A-Ye’s deployment of troops now will not hold the commoners up from plowing the lands, at least not until the third month next year.”

The caress of the wind sent Xiao Jiming's sleeves and robe fluttering, revealing the arm guards on both his wrists. "He is already a chief commander now."

Shen Zechuan could often feel Xiao Chiye stroking his cheek every night. No matter what tasks the latter had, as long as it was unnecessary, Xiao Chiye would rather remain at home.

He wanted all too much to gaze upon Lanzhou day and night.

"The sharp edge of a treasured sword comes from honing it."<sup>82</sup> The expression in Shen Zechuan's eyes was complicated as he looked at Hongyan Mountains. "My only concerns are the complex terrain and bad weather. The expedition will prove arduous beyond imagination."

"There's Lu Guangbai at the side to assist A-Ye. You don't have to over-worry." Xiao Jiming looked at Shen Zechuan. "I heard from Yizhi that you were bedridden after the battle of Duanzhou, having been badly injured. With the sudden decrease in the Libei Armored Cavalry now, all that's left to watch over Duanzhou is Wu Ziyu who is stationed in Mount Luo. If anything were to happen, you can only go to him for reinforcements."

Of the 120,000 Libei Armored Cavalry, only 30,000 remained. Dajing was a large territory, and the various camps did not have enough manpower remaining for defense. It was also quite laborious to mobilize and assemble the forces, so before Xiao Chiye returned, Shen Zechuan only had the Dunzhou Garrison Troops, Imperial Cavalry, and 5,000 Imperial Army for self-defense.

Shen Zechuan's brows creased slightly into a frown as he asked, "Has dage heard rumors?"

"When the noble clans interfered in state affairs in the past, they had the exceptional talents of Qudu suppressed in places you can't see, and now," Xiao Jiming smiled at Shen Zechuan, "it's time for them to step forth and show their worth."

Dripping the melting candle, Qiao Tianya drew out a rabbit from the edge of the candlestick. From time to time, he cast a glance at the inner chamber. Gao Zhongxiong was sitting in there too.

Yao Wenyu was always wielding his brush writing with fervor of late. The time he spent sleeping grew increasingly shorter. Several times Qiao Tianya lifted the hanging screen to enter, and all he could see was Yao Wenyu bent over the table until daybreak. The pages on the table were all a mess, although the bookshelves at the side grew increasingly packed.

“The reason the Imperial College assisted Xue Yanqing is that he removed the noble clans from office,” Yao Wenyu said. “The situation in the tenth month is still an unknown, but if Second Master’s expedition goes smoothly, then by the eleventh month, Qudu will no doubt issue an official denunciation and call to arms.”

Gao Zhongxiong said, “When the time comes, they will definitely make a big issue of Shen Wei’s troops’ defeat.”

“That’s right.” Yao Wenyu dipped his brush in ink, but did not put it to paper.

The difficulty here lay in the fact that Shen Wei’s military defeat was conclusive beyond doubt. So unless Shen Zechuan was willing to twist the narrative and shove the responsibility for Shen Wei’s crimes onto Hua Siqian, he would have to suck up the denunciation in both words and writing, no matter how he refuted it.

“I spoke to Mister Chengfeng earlier about this matter, but made no headway.” At this point, it was in the dead of night, and all was silent. With his arm resting on the desk, Gao Zhongxiong sighed at Yao Wenyu. “If ‘Shen Wei’ were to be replaced with ‘Ji Gang’, we can claim that His Lordship is Ji Gang-shifu’s youngest son. Back then, when Duanzhou was attacked by the enemies—”

Yao Wenyu waved his hand and said, “Back then, Xiao Jiming rendered assistance to Duanzhou and personally verified His Lordship’s identity. The Imperial Bodyguards later went to Dunzhou to investigate it thoroughly. His Lordship’s name is on the Shen clan’s clan register. Besides, His Lordship resembles his mother, and there will always be former acquaintances in Qudu who still remember Bai Cha’s charms.”

“Then what can we do?” Gao Zhongxiong asked. “It will be off to a bad start for us when the denunciation is released and public sentiment gets whipped up to an all-time high.”

Several times, Yao Wenyu wanted to put brush to paper, but he did not move. Ink dripped onto the paper.

“Let me think about it,” he said.

It was getting late now, and Gao Zhongxiong could not hold Yao Wenyu up from resting any further. He stood up and prepared to leave, but on seeing Yao Wenyu deep in silent thought, he advised, “The cart will find its way round the hill when it gets there.<sup>83</sup> Look at how unwilling the people of the six prefectures were to acknowledge His Lordship initially, but they are now completely won over, aren't they? Clearly, there will be a solution to this matter!"

"That's because His Lordship defended the city gates. He was willing to undergo hardships together with the six prefectures." Yao Wenyu set down the brush. "It's late. You should return early. It's not too late to discuss again tomorrow."

So Gao Zhongxiong bowed and excused himself.

The beaded curtain swayed gently. The candle in Qiao Tianya's hand was about to burn out. Seeing Yao Wenyu remaining fixed in place, he said, "It's true that His Lordship is a descendant of the Prince of Jianxing, but it's also true that His Lordship has reclaimed the wastelands in the six prefectures and implemented the census registers." Drop after drop, the melted candle swallowed up the candlestick. He continued, as if off-handedly, "However, the authenticity of the current emperor's origins is a different story altogether."

The gears in Yao Wenyu's mind clicked in place. He turned his head over.

"The thing about playing chess," Qiao Tianya blew out the candle, "is that you have to seize the advantage by making the first move."

Qudu was stiflingly hot in the ninth month. After being dismissed from court session, Cen Yu saw Chen Zhen at the entrance of the palace. He walked over and said in surprise and doubt, "I don't usually see you around, and yet you're waiting for me here today. Is something the matter?"

On hearing him, Chen Zhen raised an arm and gestured for Cen Yu to get on his horse carriage first. Once both men settled down in their seats, he stroked the beard he had grown and said, "I'm here to sound you out. A month ago, the Eight Great Training Divisions recruited new soldiers and enlisted the young and strong from the eight cities. There are currently 40,000 Capital Command Troops. What plans does Boran have for these 40,000 Capital Command Troops?"

Cen Yu gathered up his sleeves and said curiously, "Then you should go look for him. The commander of the Capital Command Troops is supposed to be nominated by your Ministry of War to begin with. Why? You have no candidate?"

“I’ve assumed office as the Minister of War for nearly thirty years. Whether it’s the Four Generals of Yongyi or the Four Generals of Xiande, they all come recommended by me, so how could I not have a candidate in mind?” Chen Zhen looked to be in a spot. “It’s just that the situation is different this time.”

“Different how?”

“This person I’m planning to recommend,” Chen Zhen said, “is a steamed bun seller.”

Even Cen Yu himself looked astonished.

“Xunyi, this matter is of utmost importance. I hope you can work with me to persuade Boran. Hua Siqian persecuted the loyal and the virtuous, so it indeed can’t be helped that Qudu has no generals. Now that the new emperor is sensible and wise, she will surely be able to exonerate former ministers who have suffered injustices!” Chen Zhen had always been cautious and meticulous when he carried out his duties in the emperor’s presence. He lifted the hem of his robe and bowed to Cen Yu in the cramped, narrow interior of the carriage. “During the reign of Yongyi, the Hua and Pan factions colluded with Ji Lei to frame the Eastern Palace for conspiring against the state. The crown prince slit his own throat in Zhaozui Temple, and there were countless casualties, injured and dead, among the Eastern Palace subordinates. Former officials from the Ministry of War also had their entire families executed and properties confiscated for this reason. Wasn’t that exactly the case for Shao Chengbi and Qiao Kanghai?”

“The empress dowager is already dead. I fear even Her Majesty will have misgivings bringing up and overturning the verdict for the old Eastern Palace case! Moreover, no one from the Shao and Qiao clans survived. What are you going to do?” Cen Yu suddenly remembered something. “Xingzhi, don’t tell me you...”

“Shao Chengbi is my elder brother-in-law.” Chen Zhen set his hands on both knees. His eyes, when raised, were pitch dark. “When the family properties were sealed off for confiscation, I bribed a warden from the Ministry of Justice and had him hidden in Qudu.”

The color drained from Cen Yu’s face.

“He endured humiliation and dragged out an ignoble existence for twenty-seven years—all just for this day.”

Author's Note:

For the relationship between the Shao clan and Chen Zhen, refer to chapter 145.

Thank you for reading.

(Or just use the character search :V)

◇ CHAPTER 265: CHENGBI ◇

Under cover of night, Ge Qingqing went to the steamed bun stall at Zhaozui Temple he had to pass by to buy buns. He stood before the stall and set aside a few coins from his palm. “Old sir, please give me two buns.”

The old man of this steamed bun stall had poor vision, with one eye blinded. He turned his head aside slightly, as if trying his best to listen to what Ge Qingqing was saying. When Ge Qingqing was done, the old man lifted the lid of the steamed bun bamboo steamer<sup>84</sup> and wrapped up the last two steamed buns with the oil paper before handing it over.

“Thanks,” Ge Qingqing said.

The old man’s voice was very hoarse as he said, “For an old customer. No charge.”

Ge Qingqing was in the midst of giving him the money when he froze in mid-action. He jerked his eyes up to stare at the other man. More than half of the lanterns on the streets had gone out, leaving only a lantern in the last throes of its life hanging a short distance away, casting a long oblique shadow from the side of the steamed bun stall.

Back then, when Ge Qingqing was in Qudu, he loved to come here to buy steamed buns as a treat to his fellow comrades. It wasn’t that the steamed buns here were delicious, but because he could head directly to Zhaozui Temple from here. He had grown himself a short beard stubble now, and was no longer as delicate and clean-cut as he had been before. Most of all, he carried himself differently, no different from the common merchants, but this blind old man could still tell who he was.

“Oh, you remember me?” Ge Qingqing looked as if he was asking off-handedly.

Holding the steamed bun steamer in his arms, the old man hobbled—he was a cripple to boot. He set the steamer back in place, dragged out the water basin under the table, and bent over to toss all the dirty bowls and chopsticks in.

“You came here yesterday,” he answered.

Ge Qingqing took a bite of the steamed bun. “You’ve got the wrong person.”

The old man washed the bowls and did not answer again. Ge Qingqing simply stood here and finished up the buns before fishing out a handkerchief to wipe his hand as he walked. The wind, carrying with it a faint fragrance of rouge, sent the remaining lantern swinging noisily. Right before Ge Qingqing’s figure was about to enter the darkness, he turned around and tossed the copper coins in his palm over. The copper coins clinked crisply as they landed on the greasy tabletop. He stuffed his handkerchief back in place and left.

The old man washed the bowls alone. Only when it was almost dawn that he put the bowls and chopsticks neatly away. The vegetable vendor next to him pushing a single-wheel cart<sup>85</sup> greeted him and shouted, “Uncle Cheng, opening for business so early?”

The old man pulled off the towel on his shoulder and wiped his sweat as he said, “I’m quitting.”

“Quitting?” The vendor set down the cart, rested his arm against the edge of the table, and asked, “Why, though?”

The old man tossed the towel onto the table, but did not touch the money Ge Qingqing left. He looked at the end of the street. “I have another job now.”

Li Jianting dozed off, and the book in her hand slipped down to her lap. A sudden weight on her shoulders instantly jolted her awake. She slapped away Fuman’s hand and bellowed, “The audacity of you!”

With the blanket in hands, Fuman kneeled and raised his hand to give himself a slap on the mouth. “This humble slave deserves a slap for disturbing Your Majesty’s rest! I ought to be slapped!”

Seeing that it was Fuman, Li Jianting tilted her face back as if relieved.

After Fuman was done hitting himself, he sneaked a glance at Li Jianting and said, "There are ice basins prepared in this hall, so it's very cool. If Your Majesty is tired, this humble slave will help you inside for a rest."

Without waiting for Li Jianting to answer, Fuman made to stand up to assist her.

"Kneel!" Li Jianting hissed through clenched teeth.

Fuman hurriedly kneeled back in place with both hands carrying the blanket. Aggrieved, he said, "Your Majesty, Your Majesty, please be appeased. This humble slave only did so in a moment of anxiety, as concerned as I am for Your Majesty's esteemed health."

Hearing Fuman's voice reminded Li Jianting of men. She moved to pick up the book in her lap, only to realize that her hand was trembling.

Fuman moved forward on his knees and said in an attempt to ingratiate, "Your Majesty mustn't get angry because of this humble slave. Your health is of utmost importance."

Li Jianting composed herself and schooled her expression, making it such that she would not need to go to the extent of standing up and withdrawing in avoidance. She clutched the book tightly, her expression slightly softening as she said amicably to Fuman. "I had a nightmare from which I had yet to fully wake up from earlier. I must have frightened you. You may rise."

It was only when Fuman saw Li Jianting's neutral expression that he set his mind at ease and stood up. "It's cold here. The next time Your Majesty feels tired, just summon this humble slave."

"Teacher is coming in a while." Li Jianting tossed the memorials to the side before Fuman went up to her. "Why aren't you waiting in attendance at the office compound?"

All Fuman was thinking of was landing a promotion and making a fortune, so he did not notice Li Jianting's actions. He bowed in congratulation. "This humble slave is here to report the good news to Your Majesty!"

"The grains and tax ledger from Juexi are here?" Li Jianting asked.

"Not yet. The relay station said it's already on the way, so presumably, these couple of days," Fuman said. "What this humble slave wants to tell Your Majesty is that the monthly accounts the palace granaries worked out reveal an earning of 80,000 taels of silvers for Your Majesty."

Li Jianting did not expect this. Surprised, she asked, "... Didn't the custodian of the palace granaries just assume office?"

"That's right, Your Majesty, and he was recommended by this humble slave." Fuman beamed with joy. "He's His Excellency Xue Xiuyi, who formerly held a post in the Ministry of Revenue."

Xue Xiuzhuo's eldest brother. The expression in Li Jianting's eyes grew slightly darker.

"If you ask me, the work His Excellency Xue did in the past was really a waste of his talents!" Fuman said. "He has only just assumed office, and already, he knows to tap new sources of income and reduce expenses. He even keeps the officials and merchants from the other regions who enter the capital in line."

"How so?"

"Your Majesty, anyone who brings goods into the capital has to pay taxes." Fuman bowed over to whisper to Li Jianting. "This account is not an easy one to collect. There are too many dishonest people defaulting on their taxes. But as it turns out, Excellency Xue has a way to deal with them. He not only collected all the debts, but also made arrangements to bring in many a number of rarities into the palace."

The palace granary custodian managed the tributes that the various regions sent to Qudu every month. Half of the fruits and vegetables that the emperor in the palace ate came from here, and the custodian had to deal with the various merchants and local officials. The tax that Ge Qingqing paid when he entered the capital went here too. The palace granary was not high of rank, and the tax collectors under it were all minor functionaries who had close dealings with the eunuchs. Over time, the eunuchs came to have the final say.

"So much?" Li Jianting asked.

"This is still too little." Fuman worked it out for Li Jianting as he counted with his fingers. "Leaving the merchants from the eight cities aside for the time being. The merchants from the thirteen cities of Juexi and Hezhou are practically swimming in money, Your Majesty. Now that the rebels are running amuck, these opportunistic merchants are heading over to Zhongbo to do business, where they no longer need to be such a stickler for the rules of etiquette and the distinction between social ranks. They are even more extravagant with their food and clothes than the officials from the capital. These people bear to spend money on themselves, but they begrudge handing money to the imperial court. They need someone to teach them a proper lesson and put them in their places.”

“Xue Pingjing is that impressive?” Li Jianting feigned ignorance. “I never heard of it before.”

“That’s because he was not put to appropriate use in the past.” Fuman flattered, “It’s all thanks to Your Majesty’s discerning eye for talents!”

Li Jianting saw Fengquan passing by the window and so knew Kong Qiu was here; thus, she said quietly to Fuman, “You did well on this matter. I shall meet him some other day.”

Fuman visibly beamed with pleasure as he retreated with the blanket in hand. When he stepped out, he only bowed to Kong Qiu while giving Fengquan a slight nod.

Outside, Fengquan respectfully announced, “Your Majesty, the Grand Secretary is here.”

Ji Gang rested his head against the rattan chair and slumbered in the courtyard. Xiao Xun and Jiran leaned over the sides of the rattan chair, stealthily drawing a mustache on Ji Gang’s face with a brush.

“Anitabha,” Jiran whispered. “A big tiger.”

“Grandpa is mighty, and the tiger is the mightiest.” Xiao Xun gave the mustache uplifted corners.

Feeling his nose itch, Ji Gang let loose an earth-shattering sneeze, and the two children immediately hid behind the rattan chair. Not at all anxious to wipe his face, Ji Gang lifted Xiao Xun by the back of his collar and feigned anger as he pinched his own real mustache. “Disrupting my sweet dream. Watch how I deal with you both!”

Xiao Xun thought Ji Gang was going to hit him and hurriedly covered his head with his arms. Unexpectedly, Ji Gang raised him high and nuzzled his mustache that seemed to be dipped in ink against Xiao Xun’s cheek, smearing it all black.

When Huo Lingyun entered, he saw Xiao Xun and Jiran running wild around the rattan chair. He made his way under the eaves along the long walkway, where Fei Sheng was watching the boisterous scene with his arms folded.

“Look at the Hereditary Prince.” He said to Huo Lingyun. “He was so fair and clean when he came.”

Huo Lingyun nodded to acknowledge the sight and asked, “Is the advisor inside the room?”

It was then Fei Sheng retracted his gaze to look at Huo Lingyun. “Something’s the matter?”

Huo Lingyun took out the letter in his sleeve pocket. This was Ge Qingqing’s letter to the Imperial Cavalry, packed with information on the movements in Qudu. It had already been opened and read.

“Take a look,” he said.

Fei Sheng took the letter and read it.

Sunlight in the courtyard shone upon the eaves, accentuating the vibrancy and brightness of its new coat of paint and concealing the agedness of this residence.

Fei Sheng finished reading the letter. His expression was calm as he continued to ask, “Have you shown it to Qiao Tianya?”

“I haven’t seen him,” Huo Lingyun answered. “He led Squad Three out of the city first thing in the morning.”

“Hold on.” Fei Sheng folded the letter, then turned around to lift the bamboo blinds. Once he entered, he bowed and reported, “Master, Ge Qingqing’s letter is here. It’s about the transfer to the post of Viceroy of the Capital Command Troops<sup>86</sup> in Qudu. The Imperial Cavalry dare not take the decision into their own hands without Master looking it over first.”

Gao Zhongxiong stopped speaking, and Shen Zechuan raised his folding fan to gesture for Gao Zhongxiong to sit. His right hand, which had seen the bandage removed in recent days, nudged the folding fan as he said to Fei Sheng, “Present it to me.”

Fei Sheng opened the letter and set it down beside Shen Zechuan’s hand.

“Shao Chengbi...” Shen Zechuan said. “I remember no such person among the appraisals that were carried out during the reign of Xiande. Was Chen Zhen the one who vouched for him?”

“Master,” Fei Sheng turned to the side and reminded him. “It’s Shao from the Ministry of War.”

Shen Zechuan’s relaxed expression curbed a little. He read it again. “Shao from the Ministry of War during the reign of Yongyi?” He looked at Fei Sheng and swiftly thought back. “... This is Shao Chengbi, the Vice Minister of the Ministry of War who was thrown into prison when Ji Lei framed him after the Eastern Palace incident?”

“Master has an excellent memory. That’s him, all right,” Fei Sheng replied. “The Eight Great Training Divisions changed their name to the Capital Command Troops this time, and all military officers sixth-grade and above were dismissed from office and replaced. Candidates for the posts were to be recommended by Chen Zhen, the Minister of War, and vetted by the Grand Secretariat ministers, and the viceroy position was granted to Shao Chengbi, who has changed his name to ‘Chengbi’ now. Ge Qingqing said that this man has never left Qudu all these years; instead, he remained next to Zhaozui Temple selling steamed buns.”

“Shao Chengbi is Chen Zhen’s elder brother-in-law. It’s only reasonable for Chen Zhen to want to save him. But Shao Chengbi ought to be over sixty years old now.” Shen Zechuan closed the folding fan again. “Qudu tells him to take up post, but can he still get on a horse and wield a spear?”

“Not only that. Master, to pull the wool over others’ eyes, he muted himself with poison and even blinded himself in an eye,” Fei Sheng said.

As the Minister of War, Chen Zhen had a stable of able generals to recommend. This person was just like Cen Yu—they were both Bo Le with a discerning eye for talents.<sup>87</sup> However, Qudu was at its most critical period now. Did he give the position of Viceroy of the Capital Command Troops to the aged Shao Chengbi because Qudu indeed had no general to choose from, or because Shao Chengbi indeed had the capabilities to speak of?

“By using a former minister,” Zhou Gui looked at Shen Zechuan, “the emperor meant to redress the injustice the Eastern Palace suffered during the reign of Yongyi.”

“It’s not that easy,” Kong Ling said,

“The eight cities have still yet to eradicate the latent threat. If the emperor were to overturn the verdict for the Eastern Palace Crown Prince at this moment, she has to first take down the remaining members of the noble clans.” Yao Wenyu covered the teacup with the lid. “She has only just stabilized the situation. She cannot take this risk.”

Li Jianting made an example out of others as a warning, using the flogging punishment to frighten the Marquis of Helian so much he was paralyzed in bed. The other clans, too, immediately made up for part of their arrears in field taxes of their own initiative. Qudu had just gotten a breather and was now sparing some energy to rebuild the Capital Command Troops. If Li Jianting were to overturn the case at this moment, it would only prove to be detrimental to Qudu.

“The old case of the Eastern Palace implicates countless officials. To overturn the verdict, there have to be procedures in place and time to spare.” Yao Wenyu continued, “It must not be rushed.”

By this, he was also tactfully reminding Shen Zechuan not to rush it. The old case of the Eastern Palace was even thornier than the case of Shen Wei’s troop defeat.

“The Shao clan has been lying in hiding for a long time,” Shen Zechuan said. “We have to ask Qiao Tianya about this.”

Qiao Tianya returned at the hour of hai and removed his armor in the side hall before heading over to the principal room to meet Shen Zechuan. He read Ge Qingqing’s letter and said, “If it’s really Uncle Shao, the Beiyuan military drill grounds will have to increase its troops.”

“The Shao clan is affiliated with the Ministry of War, and Shao Chengbi was even its Vice Minister. He’s not only familiar with the deployment details of the various lands but also Zhongbo’s topographic map.” Shen Zechuan brushed aside the tea foam with the lid. “Ce’an just left, so Qudu will not dare to mobilize troops at this time, but we have to return to Cizhou before the tenth month.”

If Yin Chang was still alive, Shen Zechuan could remain firmly in place in Duanzhou. Without Yin Chang, Shen Zechuan had to head over to Cizhou to coordinate the deployment of Cizhou’s and Dunzhou’s garrison troops.

“That’s right.” Qiao Tianya casually folded the letter into a paper crane. “The Shao clan was already considered a military general household during the ‘Three Yao’ period. The Ministry of War is not like the other five ministries. Uncle Shao was promoted by the Grand Mentor to the position of Vice Minister. He had real capabilities to speak of.”

The “Three Yao” he spoke of referred to the three ministers of importance in the Grand Secretariat during the reign of Emperor Yong’an, all three of whom came from the Yao clan of Jincheng. Of them, Yao Wenyu’s paternal grandfather was the mainstay. That was the Yao clan’s golden age, and also the beginning of the Yao clan’s swift retreat whilst still at their peak.

“In his bid to seek peace and safety, my father switched sides to the Hua clan after the Grand Mentor was imprisoned. Uncle Shao thus broke off all ties with my father.” Qiao Tianya moved the paper crane to the side of the candle and burned it. “When I left Qudu, I heard he had already been beheaded.”

“Since Shao Chengbi was promoted by the Grand Mentor, he should have addressed the Grand Mentor as ‘Teacher’,” Fei Sheng said. “Master is the Grand Mentor’s pupil. Looking at it this way, we have some connection to him too.”

“The number of people who have been promoted by the Grand Mentor during the reign of Yongyi is too many to count. Uncle Shao might be one of them, but he did not have any contact with the Eastern Palace or with the Grand Mentor. Besides, the Shao clan had a criminal charge slapped on them because of the Li clan, so naturally, it should also be the Li clan to redress the injustice they suffered.” Qiao Tianya wiped away the soot on his hands.

“But,” Zhou Gui said dubiously, “didn’t Yuanzhuo say that the emperor can’t take the risk at this time?”

“She is indeed ill-afforded to take the risk at this moment.” The teacup in Yao Wenyu’s palm had gone cold. “She only has to wait for Shao Chengbi to defeat Zhongbo’s Garrison Troops. Without external threats, won’t she then be able to get rid of the domestic threat that is the noble clans?”

Xiao Chiye was advancing east, Libei was empty, and Zhongbo had no reinforcements. If Qudu did not attack now, then when?

“If we really come to blows,” Zhou Gui said, “we still have Tantai Hu!”

“Laohu is impatient and rash by nature. He needs someone by his side supervising him.” Shen Zechuan perked up. “... Fei Sheng, give shifu a heads up. We are heading back to Cizhou.”

Credit: Thank you Lin for spotting the typos! <3

◇ CHAPTER 266: YOUJING ◇

Tantai Hu stood with his hand on his blade and listened as the messenger soldier finished his report, then nodded his head and turned around to enter the military tent. A few Dunzhou soldiers were inside smoking a pipe, and they were all Tantai Hu's trusted subordinates.

"His Lordship has orders," one of them asked, "but why is the general unhappy?"

"Stop smoking the damn pipe now. It's fouling up the air!" Tantai Hu took off his blade. "His Lordship wants me to mobilize troops to the Beiyuan military drill grounds."

The few soldiers did not dare to mess around when they saw Tantai Hu's dour expression and quickly snuffed out the pipe. The young man with the brittle, yellow hair who spoke earlier was called Liu Kong, who had been recruited from Fanzhou. He was a smooth talker, which was how he got into Tantai Hu's good graces and ended up following at Tantai Hu's side.

Liu Kong lifted the tent flap open to disperse the smell and walked over to Tantai Hu's side. With a grin, he said, "His Lordship's willingness to use the general means that he did not take Wang Xian's words to heart. He still believes the general."

"Of course His Lordship believes me." Tantai Hu set the blade on the table with a clang.

"So why is the general still angry?"

"His Lordship is sending Yu Xiaozai over to supervise the army. He's already on the way and should be able to arrive the day after tomorrow."

The blade scar on Tantai Hu's face twitched uncomfortably. "Second Master never had this rule before."

"The general is the second master's trusted aide." Liu Kong reined in his merry expression. "Not quite the same as His Lordship."

On hearing this, Tantai Hu's expression turned even more grave. After Xiao Chiye reprimanded him, he apologized to Shen Zechuan in Duanzhou and even subsidized the yamen's public funds on his return to Dunzhou. If there was no war at the start of spring next year, his soldiers had to help the Dunzhou's yamen till the land. This was no big deal, but he could not forget that day. He was always worrying that Shen Zechuan would disdain him because of this incident and stop using him in the future. But now that Shen Zechuan was continuing to use him, he sent over a military inspector.

"General," Liu Kong lowered his voice, "His Lordship is skilled in the art of checks and balance—that is the art of the sovereign.<sup>88</sup> His Excellency Yu Xiaozai is the Surveillance Commissioner of the six prefectures. In coming here, his authority of office is immense, and he outranks you. Bear with it first, General. Wait for Second Master to return, and there will naturally be a chance for you to plead your case."

Tantai Hu felt increasingly uneasy upon hearing this. "Second Master is wholeheartedly devoted to His Lordship. He will not listen to me. I fear I might just end up adding fuel to the fire."

"How muddleheaded you are, General." Liu Kong laid it out for Tantai Hu. "It is for the precise reason of having you guard Cizhou that His Lordship transfers you to the Beiyuan military drill grounds. You are so brave and valiant, you will definitely emerge victorious, and Second Master will naturally be pleased when you win the battle. When you bring up the subject of removing the military inspector with Second Master again then, he will surely agree."

Feeling uncertain, Tantai Hu said, "It will probably be next year when Second Master returns."

"Isn't that just perfect? The safety of the six prefectures lies in the general's hands. What a meritorious service this is!" Liu Kong saw Tantai Hu's expression clearing up a little and continued, "Besides, even if Yu Xiaozai comes, you don't have to really fear him. He's an official from the capital, and he's a pupil of Cen Yu of the Chief Surveillance Bureau. Who knows if his loyalty to His Lordship is genuine? I'm not saying that you judge the heart of a gentleman with the yardstick of a petty man, but with the war at hand, you can't help but be on guard."

"Youjing..." Tantai Hu was momentarily tongue-tied.

That was right. Yu Xiaozai was Cen Yu's pupil. Instead of returning to continue serving as an official of the capital, he remained in Zhongbo. His Lordship had utmost trust in him, but what if he was a spy sent by Qudu? Wouldn't His Lordship be in danger?

"You're right." Tantai Hu looked at the blade on the table. "Second Master entrusted the six prefectures to me, so I have to ensure the safety of His Lordship and Cizhou. There can only be one outcome for this battle, and that is—victory. If there is something amiss with Youjing when the time comes... I must never, never condone him!"

Liu Kong lit the pipe for Tantai Hu and handed it over to him. "I'll keep an eye on him for you, General."

With his head pillowed upon his arms, Xiao Chiye lay on the barren, deserted sand and listened to the lapping sound of the Chashi River. Silently, he counted the stars before his eyes.

He finished counting them once—it was Shen Lanzhou.

He counted them again—still Shen Lanzhou.

Lu Guangbai added a few firewoods to the campfire and turned his head to look to his left, which was quiet. "Did you bring along the warriors from the Huiyan Tribe to negotiate with Amu'er's six tribes?"

"There's no negotiation to be had with Amu'er." Xiao Chiye cast a glance at Lu Guangbai. "Second Master is now invincible. If there's to be any negotiation, he's the one who should come to me."

"You haven't grown taller," Lu Guangbai said, "but you've gotten a lot more arrogant with your manner of speech."

"Grow any taller, and I'll be towering into the sky." Xiao Chiye heaved a long sigh. "I'm already tall enough."

"The scout said that the Liaoying tribe stationed near Gedale has also withdrawn." Lu Guangbai picked up a sweet potato among the embers. "Amu'er is planning to concentrate his troops deep in the desert to deal with us."

"Right?" Catching a whiff of the sweet potatoes, Xiao Chiye abruptly sat up. Heedless of the scalding heat, he picked out a nice-looking one.

"Amu'er focused his entire army on Hasen as its core. Now that Hasen is dead, how would the rest of the tribes still be willing to fight battles for him in the warring zone?”

“Evidently, military grains pose a headache to everyone,” Lu Guangbai said. “Without Hasen, the Hulu Tribe has to make plans for themselves. Even if they don’t submit to Amu’er, they can return to the banks of Lake Chiti to continue with their lives—I haven’t eaten yet, man.”

In order to compete with that last sweet potato with Lu Guangbai, Xiao Chiye ate too fast. It was so scalding hot that both of them were huffing.

“It’s all the same with or without the Hulu Tribe.” Xiao Chiye sucked in a light breath. “The oasis of the Hulu Tribe can’t afford to feed Amu’er’s troops from the six tribes. Why else would he be farming in Gedale? He means to have a quick battle as soon as Zhongbo’s supply transportation route is severed.”

“Same goes for mobilizing troops.” Lu Guangbai propped both hands on his knees, unable to bear the scalding heat. His tongue felt numb. “This is way too scalding.”

Chen Yang came over, carrying the water bags in his hands. Seeing that there were no more sweet potatoes in the fire, he tossed the water bags to them. His expression was indescribable as he said with mixed feelings, “My dear lords... there are still over ten of us here out in the cold...”

Xiao Chiye downed the cold water and reverted to his usual self. “The moment Hasen died, the Hanshe Tribe is no longer the same as they were before. If Amu’er wants to regain his reputation, he has to win battles to prove himself to the other tribes. He wants to be the great ruler of the desert, but so do others. The Hanshe Tribe has been lording it over in the desert for so many years. It is also for self-preservation that Amu’er is urgently transferring troops now that they have suffered a heavy blow.”

Lu Guangbai laughed in understanding. “You meant to have the Huiyan Tribe negotiate with the rest of the tribes with the intention of cutting off Amu’er’s external assistance while he is amassing his forces. You want to join forces with the other tribes to encircle and annihilate him.”

“The Huiyan Tribe has been benefitting from the mutual trade market all these years.” Xiao Chiye sealed the water bag tight. “They are no longer a small tribe.”

Holding his own water bag, Lu Guangbai watched the boundless expanse of wilderness together with Xiao Chiye. The sounds of waves from the Chashi River roared incessantly—this was the echo of the lands throughout the ages.

“Once this battle is over,” Lu Guangbai said, “I’ll return to Qidong.”

“What?” Xiao Chiye said with a laugh. “Too used to eating the sands of Biansha?”

Lu Guangbai nodded, as if it was really the case. “The sands of your Libei are mixed with mud. It’s like drinking gruel.”

Having said that, both men looked aside at each other and promptly burst out into laughter.

Lu Guangbai drank a mouthful of water. “I admired your father the most in my youth. Every time I saw him, I always wanted to go over to your Libei and become a Libei Armored Cavalry. A pity my brothers at home all died later. My father was an old man at that time, and he was still rolling and crawling around in the sand. Other than me, there was no one else willing to remain in the Bianjun Commandery.”

Xiao Chiye bent his long legs to prop his arms up on them. “If it were me, I’d have long run away.”

“I really had that thought. Every time Qudu refused to give grains, I’d think of running. During the fourth year of Xiande, when we entered the capital, the emperor made me kneel at the entrance. At that time, I thought, shit, if this goes on, I will become Shen Wei Number Two.” Lu Guangbai sighed deeply. “Who knew I’d really run for real in the end.”

Remembering this incident, Xiao Chiye looked at Lu Guangbai. “At that time, Secretariat Elder Hai transferred grains to cope with the emergency, but the grains Qudu gave the Bianjun Commandery were all moldy grains. Lanzhou and I can’t figure it out. We thought Xue Xiuzhuo was the culprit, but the more we thought about it later, the stranger it felt to us.”

“I can’t figure it out either.” Lu Guangbai set down the water bag. “He forced Libei into revolting. There was no reason for him to force the Bianjun Commandery into revolting again.”

“If the Scorpion has the ability to swap out the grains,” Xiao Chiye said, “you must have come across them before.”

“I haven’t met that many officials in Qudu,” Lu Guangbai said. “On the other hand, I’ve met a bunch of eunuchs.”

Both men fell silent for a moment after he was done speaking.

Lu Guangbai jolted to his feet, and the water bag fell onto the ground.
“The army-inspecting eunuch!”

Xue Xiuyi reclined in the taishi chair.<sup>89</sup> There were people beside him doing the accounting. He only had to sit and watch the entire process, and he would have been considered to have done his job. He rotated a pair of glass spheres<sup>90</sup> in his hand—this was an exquisite little plaything he had just obtained, a tribute the merchants specially offered to him.

“Soliciting help from potential backers?” Xue Xiuyi said. “Then why are you hiding in the back? Come over and make yourself clear. Which yamen do you want to work in?”

The eyes of the beardless man with head covering swiveled around. He moved in closer to Xue Xiuyi and covered his nose and mouth to whisper, “I’d like to implore Your Excellency to pass a message to the Lao-zuzong.”

On hearing this voice, Xue Xiuyi asked, “You’re a eunuch too?”

The man started acting self-consciously and hemmed and hawed.
“Yes...”

Xue Xiuyi straightened up a little and had the people around him withdraw. He scrutinized the man with suspicion. “Stop covering yourself up. You have to let me see what you look like. If you look ugly as sin, however, a re-negotiation will be in order.”

The man moved his headscarf away and waited meekly for a moment. He did not hear a sound from Xue Xiuyi, so he raised his head and said with finesse, “Your Excellency doesn’t recognize this humble slave? Your Excellency, this humble slave is Yingxi, who served the Lao-zuzong. During the reign of Tianchen, the former emperor appointed me as the army-supervising eunuch in Qidong!”

Xue Xiuyi indeed did not recognize him. He was an insignificant, low-ranking official in the past, so how would he have the chance to come into contact with these eunuchs? Thus, he hedged his way through, “Oh yes, yes. I’ve seen you before.”

Xue Xiuyi’s eyes twinkled, but then, he recalled in a split second that the army-supervising eunuch to Qidong had been detained by Qi Zhuyin and had been long dismissed from office after his return to Qudu. He instantly turned hostile. “Weren’t you arrested by the Ministry of Justice?!”

“Oh, goodness.” Yingxi was so anxious he nearly stomped his foot. “That’s old news. There’s already a new emperor now. That bit of crime this humble slave had is already ancient history!”

Xue Xiuyi was doubtful. For starters, he was afraid that Yingxi was lying to him, and he would end up creating trouble for the Lao-zuzong if he were to get Yingxi into the palace. He was also afraid that Yingxi had yet to be fully exonerated of his crime, and if the Ministry of Justice were to investigate and trace it back to him later, he would be inviting trouble to himself for nothing, wouldn’t he?!

“It’s on the Lao-zuzong’s orders that this humble slave has come looking for Your Excellency.” Yingxi took out an authority token from under the folds of his clothes on his chest and presented it with both hands to show Xue the Eldest. “Your Excellency, please take a look. This is a token from the inner court.”

Xue Xiuyi carefully looked over the token with help from the candlelight. There was really the name “Yingxi” behind it. He clutched the token, and without returning it, asked, “Have you already cleared the Ministry of Justice? Entering the palace is not like going elsewhere. If anything goes wrong, even the Lao-zuzong himself can’t save you, much less me.”

“It’s cleared.” Fearing he would not believe him, Yingxi continued, “Can the person the Lao-zuzong find be fake? If so, this humble slave would not be standing before Your Excellency.”

Xue Xiuyi did not want to offend the eunuchs. If this Yingxi was really Fuman’s adopted son or grandson, he would be hard-pressed to explain himself to Fuman if he were to stop Yingxi outside the palace. After a moment of hesitation, he said, “Wait for the time being. A gonggong will be coming out a few days later to make purchases. He will be coming to our palace granary to select seasonal vegetables. If it’s convenient then, you can follow him in.”

Delighted, Yingxi nodded repeatedly.

Feeling uneasy, Xue Xiuyi pressed, “This is the Lao-zuzong’s arrangement.”

“Rest assured, Your Excellency.” Yingxi stuffed a bag of gold into Xue the Eldest’s hands. “This humble slave is clean. I guarantee I won’t give you or the Lao-zuzong any trouble.”

A drizzle descended upon Dunzhou a few days later. Rain pelted against the green leaves, drenching the stone slabs on the bridgeway, until they turned a shade darker. Tantai Hu waited at the entrance for a long while with Liu Kong holding up an umbrella for him. He bristled in irritation.

“They said this morning he’d be here soon; why isn’t he here yet?!”

“Perhaps there was a delay on the way.” Liu Kong craned his neck to look around and saw a horse carriage coming their way through the rain.

“General, His Excellency Yu is here!”

Drenched by the rain, the horse’s mane was dripping wet; it stopped in front of Tantai Hu and shook its mane. Tantai Hu raised a hand to pat the horse on its neck, then said to the carriage driver, “It’s been a long journey. Lead the horse to the stable later and give it a good treat.”

As he spoke, he suddenly saw the curtains of the carriage lift slightly. Yu Xiaozai poked his face out and held his hands out together in greetings<sup>91</sup> towards Tantai Hu.

“We are all well-acquainted. There is no need for such pretentious greetings.” Tantai Hu glanced into the carriage as he spoke. “Wang Xian didn’t come?”

“His Lordship has returned to Cizhou, and Duanzhou still has to supply grains to Second Master. Someone has to be present to keep an eye on it, so he stayed behind in Duanzhou.” Yu Xiaozai got off the carriage, and the soldier by the side moved to hold up an umbrella for him. He took it over and held it up himself, shielding Tantai Hu as both of them walked in together.

“You are a general of Dunzhou, and he is the treasurer of the six prefectures,” Yu Xiaozai said. “Laohu, you can afford to offend anyone but not the money-keeper.”

As the rain drummed noisily against the oil paper umbrella, Tantai Hu said, “How would I dare offend him? When he comes to my Dunzhou in the future, I will deploy a procession of troops ten li<sup>92</sup> long to welcome him and ensure that I speak to him with utmost gentleness.”

Yu Xiaozai knew he was still sulking, so he said in persuasion, “Laohu, please don’t think that we make little of military officers; that’s all on the bad practices in Qudu. Now that the six prefectures are stabilized, all the various departments have to go by the book. Let me speak out of turn to say a word to you. When it comes to the military grains preparations, you are too easily blinded by your own concern for the matter. You take the military grains into consideration because of your loyalty to Second Master. No one would bear to reproach you had it been anyone else, but since His Lordship clearly designated Brother Minshen to handle it,” The rain drenched Yu Xiaozai’s sleeve. He swapped over to the other hand and turned around to continue, “that means it’s a legitimate assignment he has been appointed to carry out. You asked him on the court of the yamen, but how can he answer you there? The grains and land tax ledgers are confidential yamen documents. You can’t lay them out in the open for a discussion.”

Tantai Hu could tell that Yu Xiaozai was here to play peacemaker in an attempt to clear the air between him and Wang Xian. Not that he had to keep dwelling on this matter; he just felt what Wang Xian did to be unethical. Couldn’t Wang Xian just say something in Dunzhou itself? He was still acting all affable when he left, but then he turned around and lodged a complaint about him to His Lordship!

“Brother Minshen is an official from the capital. He’s new here, and there will inevitably be some people who can’t accept him.” Yu Xiaozai spoke effusively. “You’re Second Master’s trusted aide, so he naturally does not dare to contradict you on the spot; he simply spoke the truth to His Lordship. He has rendered meritorious service in making preparations for the military provisions, and he is well-versed in economics and governmental affairs. His Lordship will most certainly put him with military administration. You are bound to run into each other often in the future. After all, when you mobilize troops in the future, you will have to discuss military provisions and military expenses with him. It’s inadvisable to let the situation deteriorate to the point it ends in a deadlock.”

Yu Xiaozai had a point, but his words left a bad taste in Tantai Hu’s mouth. Yu Xiaozai was clearly speaking up for Wang Xian for the unfair treatment the latter had received. It had not been easy for Wang Minshen, given that he was new here, but did that mean that he, Tantai Hu, deserved to suffer such humiliation? Just thinking about the grains and land tax ledger incident really made him fume. Wang Xian did not say a single word to him before he left, and no one in the Dunzhou yamen mentioned the public funds when he rewarded the garrison troops with a feast. He finally realized in hindsight that the Dunzhou yamen was using Wang Xian to marginalize him.

Yu Xiaozai understood it too. The Dunzhou yamen did not dare to stir up trouble with Tantai Hu head-on, so they kept humoring him. Tantai Hu was the commanding general of Dunzhou, yet he had not even seen Dunzhou's grains and land tax ledger. This was the yamen officials setting him up for a fall, wasn't it? He was suffering in silence, unable to voice his grievances before Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye. His reprehensible deed in setting up that ostentatious feast, too, had mortally ashamed him.

But these were extraordinary times, and it was inadvisable to delve further into this matter.

Yu Xiaozai handed the umbrella into Tantai Hu's hand and spoke in all earnestness, "Laohu, you are straightforward by nature, and you only know how to advance but not retreat, so you will inevitably be on the losing end in matters like this. They are making things difficult for you for no other reason than because you have military power in hand. Let me give you a word of advice again. If you have no intention of being an official of the yamen, then don't mess with them in these waters. You have illustrious military merits to your name, so His Lordship will not let you suffer a genuine grievance. Do you think His Lordship can't see what is going on this time? Second Master flew into such a rage, but His Lordship still let you return to Dunzhou untouched. Is he not backing you up by that? His Lordship is giving them a good rap on the head on your behalf! Don't you go getting into a sulk with His Lordship. Acknowledge your mistakes with respect and humility, and make up for the public funds in all conscientiousness. As long as you're willing to write a letter to bury the hatchet with Brother Minshen, I guarantee you that His Lordship will reward you within half a month."

Was it so easy to be an official of the capital? Those who said being officials of the capital was a cushy job had all been deceived by rumors in the streets. Any official who could gain a foothold in Qudu, regardless of seniority and family background, were all figures who had been through the period during the reign of Yongyi and Xiande when the Hua and Pan clans interfered in state affairs. They were discerning men who knew best to adapt to current circumstances. Yu Xiaozai was of humble origins. When the noble clans were in power, he worked in the localities, where he dealt with all sorts of local lowlifes. His appraisals were all outstanding. Cen Yu had promoted so many pupils, but only Yu Xiaozai could repeatedly undertake heavy responsibilities. His words to Tantai Hu were all heartfelt.

Tantai Hu's lips moved soundlessly, his anger all but choked in his throat.

Seeing Tantai Hu's gloomy expression, Yu Xiaozai knew he could still not swallow this anger. Hitting on a brainwave, he said, "If you could humble yourself to make peace with Brother Minshen, you'd be shutting up the others' mouth, wouldn't you? They ridicule you for being an ignorant and illiterate person like General Lu Meng from the southern state of Wu,<sup>93</sup> so don't let them get their way and show them what you are made of!"

Tantai Hu was impatient by nature, so it would not do to provoke him. However, he was simple-minded and bore no ill will. Once he was enlightened, he would be willing to do as advised. He tightened his grip on the umbrella and said in a rough voice, "Second Master disciplined me, and I know where my mistake lies. I shouldn't have held the banquet as I did, and I definitely have to make up for the public funds. I've even kowtowed back in Duanzhou, so apologizing to Wang Minshen is no big deal." He raised an arm to rub his scar. "I'll write a letter to Wang Xian tonight."

There were many puddles on the ground, and the clamor of the rain was so noisy Liu Kong could not hear their conversation. He held up the umbrella, unable to get too close. All he could do was follow them the entire way. Fortunately, it was not a long journey to make. Before he could keep away the umbrella upon arrival at the camp, Tantai Hu sent him off to prepare the pot.

"It's cold, and the journey is arduous. You and I still have to leave again for Cizhou tomorrow." Tantai Hu removed his outer robe and rolled up his sleeves. "Let's have hotpot tonight to warm ourselves up. Liu Kong, go get those rabbits I've hunted ready. Youjing and I will have them with wine."

Liu Kong acknowledged his orders. With deft moves, he helped Yu Xiaozai to remove his outer robe and hang it up on the small clothes rack inside the tent.

Rubbing his hands, Yu Xiaozai surveyed the tent and said cheekily to Tantai Hu, "This living quarter of yours is a tad too simple, isn't it?! I thought..."

Liu Kong retreated to the door and let down the tent flap, blocking out Yu Xiaozai's voice.

The roads were wet and slippery on rainy days, and the bridleway was bumpy. Shen Zechuan was initially playing chess with Yao Wenyu, but midway through the game, he got so dizzy he felt terrible. Fei Sheng lifted the screen of the carriage a little, and it was only after he leaned against the window that he regained his composure.

“Youjing is quick-witted and resourceful.” Yao Wenyu looked at the rain. “He’s witty with his words, and he doesn’t put on airs. There is no better person than him to supervise the army; Your Lordship had made the right choice in sending him over.”

“Youjing can provide amusement when time permits, but he will never err when it comes to what’s crucial.” Shen Zechuan had broken out in a bit of a cold sweat as he leaned against a soft pillow. “He doesn’t speak outright in black and white terms as Zhou Gui does. He’s more diplomatic.”

Yao Wenyu gathered up his sleeves to put away the chess pieces.

Shen Zechuan listened to the damp and dense sound of the rain by the window, still pinching a chess piece between his fingertips as he tapped it against the edge of the table in tandem with the sound of the rain.

After a while, he said, “Water that is too clean has no fish, but it’s also vexing when it’s too murky.”<sup>94</sup>

◇ CHAPTER 267: CHRYSANTHEMUM TRIBUTE ◇

Qudu was due to appreciate the chrysanthemums in the ninth month,<sup>95</sup> but as Yongcheng was hit by a drought and the imperial court still owed part of the capital officials' monthly salaries, everyone inside and outside the palace complied with Li Jianting's decree and did not brazenly organize a chrysanthemum appreciation banquet.

Fuman had initially found some people to cultivate several hundred pots of precious chrysanthemums in his own residence, but now, he dared not send them in anymore.

During the third quarter of the hour of yin, Fuman woke up. As the junior eunuch waited on him, he rinsed his mouth and changed his clothes. Eunuchs had to stay close to their master's side to serve at all times, so naturally, they could not have any odor on them. Their collars were all false collars, so they could immediately swap them out when they got stained with sweat. Their socks and shoes were velvet with tight openings that did not make any sounds when walking.

Fuman cleaned himself up and dressed neatly, then set his authority token before his waist and strode out of the door. He saw there were still stars in the sky, so he went to the duty room close to Mingli Hall and asked a eunuch who waited in attendance in the bedchamber last night, "Did Her Majesty sleep well yesterday?"

The eunuch was in the midst of having breakfast with tea. Eunuchs like them did not dare to eat as they pleased while on night watch, for fear they would need the lavatory at night and their breath would stink, so they only dared to have some snacks to fill their tummies before they went in. The eunuch was famished, but when he heard Fuman's inquiry, he hurriedly stood at attention with hands respectfully by his sides and replied, "To answer the Lao-zuzong, she slept decently yesterday, turning over four times. Contrary to expectation, she did not call for this humble slave."

Fuman estimated the time and reckoned that Li Jianting ought to have woken up by now, so he stood under the eaves and waited to be summoned. After a while, he saw Fengquan stepping out. Even so, Fuman merely smiled and nodded as a greeting of sorts.

As if he did not notice this, Fengquan bowed to him as per etiquette.

"Her Majesty had the mind last night to summon the Lao-zuzong to wait upon her." Bowing, Fengquan said unhurriedly to Fuman, "Lao-zuzong, a double blessing is about to descend."

Fuman could not figure out what Fengquan had up his sleeve. His suspicions were roused, and he did not dare to answer without thinking, so he merely gave an ambiguous reply, "I hope it is as you say."

Having said that, he did not wait for Fengquan to continue before he lifted the hem of his robe and entered Mingli Hall.

The hanging drapes in the bedchamber had just been bundled up, and the windows all around were wide open. Fuman could sense the chill from the falling frost in the early morning. With small, quick steps, he walked over to the bronze mirror, where he saw that Li Jianting was already done dressing and dolling up. Under normal circumstances, he was most certain to sing praises at this moment, but he was cautious today and merely said, "Your Majesty, breakfast is ready."

Li Jianting wore her usual expression, the flower embellishment between her forehead eye-catching as she held up the golden hairpin. "Just a light meal is fine."

"This humble slave dare not forget Your Majesty's instructions and has specially gotten the Court of Imperial Entertainments to choose the simple dishes to make." Fuman bowed and made to support Li Jianting. "It's just mini steamed twist rolls and silky jade tofu."

Li Jianting stepped out of the bedchamber. The memorials on her desk were all newly endorsed last night. She relooked over the pile that she had specially picked out.

“Tell the Grand Secretary later,” Li Jianting pried apart the twisted roll, “that the Grand Secretariat can skip the memorials paying obeisances; there’s no need to pass them on to me. Like this You Tan of Liuzhou in Juexi. He is so tediously long-winded in his memorials, and all he goes on and on spouting are words of flattery. What a waste of time.”

On hearing this, Fuman, who was serving Li Jianting as she had her meal, said with a smile, “This humble slave has also heard of this Excellency You. I heard this is how his memorials are. Even Secretariat Elder Hai couldn’t stand to read them in the past.”

Li Jianting did not answer. She finished her breakfast and hurried to attend the morning court session.

The topic of Libei’s advancement east was broached during the morning court session. The scouts in Dancheng had reported the increment of troops at the Beiyuan military drill grounds. However, before the Ministry of War was done presenting their military report, the Ministry of Personnel started bickering with the Ministry of Revenue, wanting the Ministry of Revenue to hurry up and pay out the arrears in monthly salaries. The Ministry of Revenue was at their wit’s end; they had no money, and they could not push the issue to Li Jianting. All they could do was endure the scoldings in silence. Midway through the rebuke, an imperial censor from the Chief Surveillance Bureau impeached the local officials for dereliction of duty in their negligence to administer public order—the new prefectural prefect of Huaizhou had not even taken office for half a month, and already a riot had broken out in Huaizhou.

“The monthly salaries were docked to provide aid relief to Yongcheng,” the official from the Ministry of Revenue said. “In times of national crisis, we ought to work as one for a common purpose. Your monthly salaries have not been issued, but the same can be said for the rest of us from the Ministry of Revenue. All of us are starving. How can you just rebuke us?!”

“You people have been auditing the accounts, and you have checked Dancheng and Wucheng. The properties of the Pan and Han clans have been sealed off for confiscation, and with the Fei clan of Chuancheng taking the lead, the rest of the remaining cities are now making up for the field taxes.” The official from the Ministry of Personnel retorted, “Going by the budget at the start of the year, there is enough to pay out the monthly salaries at this point. So where's the money? Where has all the money gone? You have to give us an explanation!"

"First we have the passing of Her Majesty the Empress Dowager, followed by the ascension of Her Majesty the Emperor, so ask the Ministry of Rites, where has the money gone? They have all been used right where they are needed! There's also the renovation of the Imperial Ancestral Temple, and the reconstruction of the residential district. The Ministry of Works..."

"Stick to the topic of the monthly salaries," the official from the Ministry of Works butted in sharply. "Why digress?"

"We are upright men who fear no gossip. The accounts we investigated were all reviewed by the Ministry of Justice and the Court of Judicial Review, then audited by the Grand Secretariat and reported to Her Majesty. We have held nothing back." Liang Cuishan bowed to Li Jianting. "Your Majesty, the Ministry of Revenue's accounts are all submitted to the Grand Secretariat every month, with memorandums issued by the Grand Secretary and endorsement by Your Majesty. Every process goes strictly by the book and is carried out in stringent accordance with the rules..."

"Goes strictly by the book? Your Excellency Chongshen, I doubt that's the case." The imperial censor from the Chief Surveillance Bureau raised his hands to pay his obeisances. "Your Majesty, this humble subject is just about to impeach Xue Xiuyi, formerly of the Ministry of Revenue, for taking bribes!"

This one shout brought a solemn silence upon the entire hall. The few bunches of people who had started arguing all turned their heads over.

Xue Xiuzhuo stood silently among the crowd of ministers, his eyes never even twitching once.

Li Jianting cast a glance at Xue Xiuzhuo. After a moment's pause, she said, "Isn't Xue Xiuyi now the custodian of the palace granaries?"

"To reply Your Majesty, that is correct. This person has been bungling his work ever since he was in the Ministry of Revenue. He has slandered the imperial court repeatedly and has never been entrusted with heavy responsibilities." The imperial censor lifted the hem of his robe and kneeled before continuing, "That is, until a few months ago when Xue Xiuyi colluded with the merchants and took advantage of the general amnesty Your Majesty granted to bribe the palace eunuchs and obtain the post of palace granaries custodian."

The golden butterfly at Li Jianting's temple swayed lightly as she straightened up on her throne.

"Xue Xiuyi brazenly made a fortune in this position and gained himself three courtyards on Donglong Street. This person is shameless. He even collaborated with the palace eunuchs to falsify accounts and resold the treasures he pilfered from the palace granaries for a grand total of 200,000 taels!"

A clamor instantly broke out in the hall. Yongcheng's aid relief was merely 100,000 taels, and Xiao Chiye's bribery case that involved the Quancheng's silk during the reign of Xiande was only 8,000 taels. Who could have expected Xue Xiuyi to embezzle 200,000 taels less than three months after he assumed office?!

"R-rat..."<sup>96</sup> The long-time Grand Secretariat officials felt dizzy.

Li Jianting's expression grew increasingly darker. The treasures Xue Xiuyi resold netted 200,000 taels, but he had Fuman report 80,000 taels to her, which meant that they had misappropriated all the remaining 120,000 taels.

"This humble subject also wants to impeach the Vice Minister of the Court of Judicial Review, Xue Xiuzhuo!" The imperial censor switched targets and pointed directly at Xue Xiuzhuo. "Xue Xiuzhuo abuses his power and exploits public office for private gain! He is high of rank, yet he reflects not upon himself. He is in Your Majesty's favor, and yet he understands not Your Majesty's heart. He lets a rat into the granaries and acts in cahoots with Xue Xiuyi. He is truly most abominable, reprehensible, and condemnable!"

"The audacity!" Li Jianting snapped.

Everyone in the hall fell to their knees. It was so silent one could hear a pin drop.

Li Jianting stood up and turned to the side before the throne, saying as she pointed at the imperial censor, "As an imperial censor responsible for the important task of supervising and impeaching the various officials, you ought to verify the facts! You are keenly aware that you hold sway over the narrative presented to the imperial court, yet you use this as an excuse to discriminate against those who hold dissenting opinions from you. If you ask me, you're the abominable one!"

The rank of an imperial censor was not high, but he was a deterrent force to behold from top to bottom. Even Emperor Guangcheng did not dare to rebuke the imperial censors back then; it was a one-way street where only the imperial censors could reprimand him, not the other way round. Except for that punk Li Jianheng during the reign of Tianchen who, in order to stabilize the situation during the bribery case, lost his temper at Fu Linye. Other than that, there had never been an emperor in Dazhou who dared to offend the imperial censors on the imperial court.

Sure enough, the imperial censor immediately said, "This humble subject has conclusive evidence, yet Your Majesty insists on siding with the criminal minister. Is that not a failure to distinguish between right and wrong, good and evil—"

"Xue Xiuzhuo is the Imperial Preceptor!" Li Jianting said frostily. "How can I allow you to bring such false accusations against my teacher?!"

Kong Qiu's heart sank. As he prostrated himself, he exchanged a glance with Cen Yu.

"Xue Xiuyi took bribes and perverted justice. I am now ordering the Ministry of Justice to investigate. You must get to the bottom of the matter as soon as possible. As for Xue Xiuzhuo," Li Jianting left with a flick of her sleeve, "It's all a bunch of crocks!"

"Your Majesty," the imperial censor said sorrowfully, "the Xue clan, if not eliminated, will go on to become a faction! He, Xue Xiuzhuo, is clearly the next Hua Siqian..."

Xue Xiuzhuo lay prostrated over the ground with his head lowered, never once saying a word.

As evening approached, it began to rain in Qudu too.

Fengquan waited in attendance outside Mingli Hall and vaguely heard Kong Qiu in the midst of remonstrating.

"Xue Xiuzhuo may be Your Majesty's teacher, but he's implicated in Xue Xiuyi's bribery case. According to the law, he has to be suspended pending investigation too," Kong Qiu said. "Your Majesty rebuked the imperial censor on the imperial court today, which runs counter to the late Taizong's<sup>97</sup> precepts. That truly should not have happened."

Li Jianting had remained silent after dismissing the court session. No matter how Kong Qiu spoke with urgency, she did not answer. Kong Qiu got up and bowed down. Seeing that Li Jianting had no wish to answer, he straightened up and bowed again.

“I have already made up my mind,” Li Jianting said. “The Grand Secretary need not persuade me any further. Fengquan, help the Grand Secretary away!”

The drizzle in Qudu continued uninterrupted. Fengquan supported Kong Qiu by the arm and personally held up the umbrella for him. Kong Qiu strode out of Mingli Hall. The strong wind stirred up several fallen leaves. He turned all of his exhortations into a single sigh and gently pushed Fengquan aside. Without even wanting the umbrella, he stepped into the rain by himself. Fengquan hurriedly lifted the hem of his robe and chased after him, holding the umbrella up high as he sent Kong Qiu all the way out.

On hearing the wind, Fuman, who was on the other side, hurried to Mingli Hall, where he kneeled even before he stepped through the door. The instant he kneeled, he wiped his tears with his sleeves. He wanted to cry injustice through the hanging screen, but he had not even opened his mouth when a teacup suddenly came hurtling towards him from the interior and smashed to pieces on the ground before him.

“You hanker after fame and position, and you colluded with an imperial court official to misappropriate treasures from the palace.” Li Jianting rebuked through the curtain. “Men, drag this deceitful jerk out!”

Fuman had heard the details of the dispute during the morning court session from his informant in the duty room. He hardened his heart and kneeled on those shattered porcelain pieces. With hands on the ground, he hastily kowtowed, “Your Majesty! Your Majesty, please hear this humble slave out. That Xue Xiuyi was transferred on the recommendation of the excellencies from the Ministry of Personnel. What has it got to do with lowly people like this, this humble slave? Oh, Your Majesty,” he cried out miserably, “what have I done to deserve such injustice?!”

Li Jianting brandished her sleeves and said nothing, looking as if she was still furious.

Fuman then kowtowed with loud thuds as he cried, “This humble slave’s lowly life is nothing to bemoan about. Your Majesty may just go ahead and punish me. However, the lords on the imperial court are all men well-versed in the classics. How can they trample upon this humble slave like this?!”

Fuman already had someone to clear away the stuff that Xue Xiuyi had paid tribute to him. He was usually cautious, so he would not send all the good stuff into the palace; instead, he had them hidden all in his residence in Qudu, with his godsons looking after them. Now that this had happened, the Ministry of Justice was definitely going to investigate the case and check him out; thus, he had immediately sent someone to pass on the tip when he was still back there in the duty room.

On hearing Fuman's wretched cries, Li Jianting looked as if her sense of compassion had really been evoked.

Fuman seized the opportunity and was about to recriminate the Chief Surveillance Bureau for seeking credit for themselves under the pretense of remonstrating when he saw Fengquan hurrying back.

Fengquan stood under the eaves and kept away the umbrella. As if he did not see Fuman pleading his case, he reported to Li Jianting, who was inside the chamber, "Your Majesty, while on the way, this humble slave saw several junior eunuchs hurrying along with flowers in their arms. It was only after questioning them I found out they were delivering those flowers to Mingli Hall."

Fuman found those few eunuchs familiar. Each of them was carrying expensive chrysanthemums in their hands. He then looked again at Fengquan, who was standing with head held high, and suddenly felt an ill sense of foreboding.

Li Jianting lifted the hanging screen and walked out. With a frown on her brows, she asked, "I've already given the instructions not to waste time and energy planting these chrysanthemums. Who was the one who sent them in as tributes? The duty room never reported them either."

The eunuchs kneeled and kowtowed, "To answer Your Majesty, Fugonggong was the one who gave the instructions."

Fuman was burning with anxiety as he refuted, "How dare you spout nonsense with the Son of Heaven here! It's my turn to be on duty today, so when have I ever instructed you to do such a thing?"

The palace still owed the outer court ministers their monthly salaries. Li Jianting kept up with the order she issued when Yongcheng was hit by a drought. The palace still pursued a policy of frugality, and there were signs of doing away with the customary need for extravagance. What's more, Fuman was currently implicated in the pilfering of the palace granaries, and this was right when he feared getting caught up in trouble. By piteously pleading his case here, he meant to abandon Xue Xiuyi and make him the scapegoat. He wanted to make a big issue of how he himself did not dine on delicacies and was instead consuming soybeans every day, but he did not expect the sudden turn of events and found himself in even more of a predicament.

“Castrated traitor, shut your mouth!” Li Jianting’s expression grew increasingly grim as she said to the eunuch in an icy voice, “Tell me the truth.”

The eunuch answered in terror, “Last night, Fu-gonggong sent someone to pass on instructions to this humble slave. He said the chrysanthemums from his manor were sent into the palace together with the ones purchased by the Court of Imperial Entertainments. These flowers, being valuable, all have to be well taken care of. Once Your Majesty gets off court session today, we should send them to Mingli Hall to relieve Your Majesty’s boredom—”

Fuman’s limbs were icy cold. In a flash, he snapped, “How dare you frame me without proof! Since you say I was the one who sent someone over, where is the note? Where is the authority token?”

The eunuch raised an arm to wipe away the rain. Fuman’s interrupting bellow gave him such a fright that he nearly slumped paralyzed to the ground. “... The person who came looked familiar; he is th-the Lao-zuzong’s godson. How would this humble slave dare demand a token?”

Fuman clenched the porcelain piece, which dug into his palm and turned it into a mangled pulp of flesh and blood. The moment Fuman heard that the eunuch did not have an authority token, he replied immediately, “So it’s really a load of bullshit! I have served the nobility in the palace for nearly twenty years, and even though I may be stupid, I know the rules. No one does their duties and errands without a token. Your Majesty, Your Majesty!” He held up his own authority token and shuffled forward on his knees, looking at Li Jianting as his cries grew increasingly louder. “Even if this humble slave dies today, it has to be a justified death!”

“Your Majesty, this humble slave also finds this matter odd.” Fengquan lifted the hem of his robe to kneel before Li Jianting. “Fu-gonggong helms the affairs within the palace and is Your Majesty’s trusted right-hand man. It would absolutely not do to let him be framed with false charges. We have to first ascertain the truth.” He looked at Fuman, “Why don’t we summon that ‘godson’ who passed on the gonggong’s order before Your Majesty so that Your Majesty can see what’s really going on?”

Fuman deciphered derision in that delicate, handsome face. Without waiting for Fuman to respond, Li Jianting commanded the guards, "Go. Find and bring the lao-zuzong's son over."

She stressed the words "lao-zuzong" so heavily that it chilled Fuman to the bone.

Within a few moments, the guards brought the man to the front of the hall. Rainwater washed over the steps. This godson lowered his head and prostrated himself over the ground in the rain, shivering all over.

Unable to get a clear look, Li Jianting said, "Lift your head."

He let loose a whimper and clung close to the ground, shaking his head frantically as if he had been given a scare. The guards at the side pressed him down by his shoulders and lifted his head up.

Li Jianting did not recognize him, but the junior eunuch in the rain said, "That's him, Your Majesty. It's Yingxi-gonggong!"

"Yingxi, the army-supervising eunuch during the reign of Tianchen." Fengquan quietly reminded Li Jianting. "The Prince of Donglie held him in custody and brought him into the capital. He has long been imprisoned in the Ministry of Justice's prison."

Fuman looked at Yingxi, stunned. As the guards approached him, he snapped to his senses and shouted, "This humble slave has been wronged... Your Majesty... this person is definitely not..."

Chafing against the ground, Yingxi started bawling. He clung to the ground, choking and crying, "Lao-zuzong, Lao-zuzong, save me, save this son of yours!"

Li Jianting yanked away the hem of the skirt that Fuman touched and looked at him. "How very capable of you. You can even extricate a eunuch the Ministry of Justice convicted. As expected of the 'Lao-zuzong' thousands of people look to for backing."

A chill spread all over Fuman's body. He knew death was certain this time. "Your, Your Majesty," he murmured, "please show mercy on account of old ties..."

"You and I are merely master and servant in the palace," Li Jianting said, "so where are there old ties to speak of? I showed you great favor, yet you do not know to feel gratitude. You committed such a grave mistake that I am well-justified in killing you."

As the guards dragged Fuman, Fuman's round collar choked him by the neck. Panicking, he kicked out with his legs and struggled. "Your Majesty!

Your Majesty—”

Fengquan signaled the guards with his eyes, who promptly gagged Fuman and dragged him out the fastest they could.

“It didn’t work?” Shen Zechuan looked back and glanced at Fei Sheng.

Fei Sheng nodded. “Allegedly, the emperor rebuked the imperial censor in anger on the imperial court, causing such a stir that it became the talk of the town. Master, didn’t she reward Jiang Qingshan earlier for the sake of pitting herself against Xue Xiuzhuo? This is such an excellent opportunity, so how did teacher and pupil become on such good terms again?”

Shen Zechuan looked askance at the bright mirror. The jade earring on his right ear was dark and obscure. He contemplated it over for a moment. “I have underestimated the emperor.”

Yao Wenyu watched under the eaves as the raindrops dripped. He suddenly brandished his arm and brushed away the entire chessboard of chess pieces. The black and white pieces instantly splashed into the rain, where ripples soon covered them up. Feeling the metallic taste of blood in his throat, he coughed a few times. “The tree that stands above the forest will be blown over by the wind; the soil that jutted out of the riverbank will be washed away by the rapids.<sup>98</sup> From what the emperor said on the imperial court, she meant to both use and depose Xue Xiuzhuo.”

Credits: Neon Starrzzify for pointing out the typo! <3

◇ CHAPTER 268: BODHI ◇

Xue Xiuyi's legs felt weak. He braced himself against the doorframe as he slid to the ground, where he sat and watched as his wife, concubine, and maidservants pack up the valuables with harried expressions. He muttered, "Can't leave... I haven't gotten Jin-ge'er back..."

The sound of footsteps rang out beyond the courtyard. The guard guarding the compound craned his neck for a look and got the fright of his life when he saw that it was all the Capital Command Troops. The door to the courtyard slammed open with a crash. As the Capital Command Troops swarmed in, Xue Xiuyi waved his arms and cried, "The imperial censor slandered me. I was wrongly accused!"

The newly appointed general of the Capital Command Troops fished out an authority token and document from under the folds of his clothes and said, "The writ from the Ministry of Justice comes with Her Majesty's inked approval." He surveyed the courtyard. "Take the rest of them away."

The Capital Command Troops hoisted Xue Xiuyi up, his feet slipping on the ground as they gagged him.

With Fuman imprisoned, a batch of eunuchs had been removed from office. That very night, Li Jianting swapped out all the key officials from the palace affairs yamen. The guards who went knocking on doors did not even wait for the parties involved to refute; they simply gagged them outright and arrested them, moving even faster than they did the time Li Jianting was poisoned. The sounds of footsteps prevailed everywhere in the palace, and innumerable guards stood in the shadows at the foot of the walls. Eunuchs and palace maids who were still on shift duty moved and spoke with caution. Everyone of them kept their hands to themselves and lowered their heads, not daring to look around as they pleased.

Xue Xiuzhuo did not sleep. With his clothes draped over him, he stood by the window and listened to the flurry of running footsteps beyond the high wall. The overcast clouds had just dispersed after the rain stopped, and the cold, clear moonlight bathed him within. Shadows of the bamboo before the window fell upon his side profile.

“Uh, uh.” Ya-er rubbed his nose roughly and urged Xue Xiuzhuo to rest.

Xue Xiuzhuo looked back and asked, “Is Jin-ge’er sleeping well?”

Ya-er nodded and pointed in the direction of Xue Jin’s room as he uttered “uh-huh” in a reply of sorts.

Xue Xiuzhuo thus said, “You may go to bed.”

Ya-er was unwilling to. He beckoned to Xue Xiuzhuo with a hand, indicating for him to eat something.

Xue Xiuzhuo did not answer. He lowered his fingers to pick up the chess piece on the chessboard and scrutinized it, as if he could not figure out something. Ya-er looked resigned when he saw Xue Xiuzhuo remaining still in place, but instead of leaving, he sat down at the entrance of the room.

A long time passed before Xue Xiuzhuo tossed the chess piece back into the chess container.

The next day, after the morning court session, Xue Xiuzhuo waited outside Mingli Hall for Li Jianting to summon him. There were countless memorials impeaching him today. The moment Xue Xiuyi was imprisoned, the charge of corruption and bribery against him was substantiated. Rumors on the streets kept in step with the course of events, and subsequently, the number of students from the Imperial College sending visiting cards<sup>99</sup> to Xue Xiuzhuo saw a decline too.

“Xue Xiuzhuo’s taking of another man’s son indeed runs counter to feudal ethics.”<sup>100</sup> An imperial censor knelt before the emperor’s desk. “No matter what, Xue Xiuyi is his elder brother of lawful birth. Your Majesty, since time immemorial, there has never been a case where the younger brother of common birth seized the legitimate first-born son of his older brother of lawful birth. What’s more, as the Imperial Preceptor, he ought to lead by example. By acting in such a way, isn’t he teaching the whole world to show contempt for the rules of propriety and to disregard one's clansfolk?"

Li Jianting closed the memorial. "Xue Xiuyi favors his concubine and neglects his wife, and he hankers after wealth and is given to extravagance. On the contrary, I think that in doing so, Xue Xiuzhuo has acted exactly in accordance with propriety. He is doing it in consideration of his Xue clan's legitimate lineage. There is nothing improper with it."

This imperial censor was almost seventy of age. He tottered unsteadily as he kowtowed and continued, "This old subject thinks otherwise. If his elder brother has done wrong, he can openly admonish and exhort him. This is what it means by showing love and respect as brothers should..."

Li Jianting, having heard an entire morning's worth of tenets on propriety, promptly rose to her feet.

"... As the saying goes, appoint the virtuous, and stability will prevail; appoint the unvirtuous, and turmoil will reign.<sup>101</sup> What is a person of virtue? He is one who can distinguish between the noble and the humble and abides by the rules of propriety... Your Majesty, just as fine medicine that cures is bitter on the tongue, sincere advice that benefits is often jarring on the ears."

Unable to take a stride forward, Li Jianting sat back down.

The sunny weather that followed the rain was stifling hot, so scorching that the flowers planted before the hall wilted a little. The imperial censor rested for a moment, drank a cup of tea, and continued with his exhortations all without waiting for Li Jianting to speak, and so Li Jianting sat there from the time she got off morning court session until the hour of you.

After drinking the nth cup of tea, the imperial censor said genially to Li Jianting, "Your Majesty, the more intelligent and knowledgeable one is, the more one has to keep their eyes and ears open..." he smacked his lips and took a couple of breathers, "and hence..."

"Listening to your sermon today trumps studying the classics for ten years." Li Jianting got up and came over to personally help the imperial censor up. The flower embellishment on her forehead made her face appear all the more vibrant and beautiful. With an amicable countenance, she said, "I shall have to ask you to share these most sagacious, famous sayings with the students of the Imperial College another day. It's late today, and I can see the signs of weariness on your face. You should head back first for a rest."

The imperial censor answered, "I am not worthy" as he walked, but even right before he stepped out of the door, he still had to add, "The wise sage nips the trouble in the bud."<sup>102</sup> Xue Xiuzhuo..."

Discerning enough to read the scene, Fengquan came over with a bow to help support the imperial censor. With a smile, he said, "The ground before the hall is slippery. Your Venerable Excellency, please watch your steps. This humble slave shall support you as you walk."

The imperial censor let Fengquan support him and walked off into the distance. The sunset glow of the setting sun cast a reddish-orange sheen over the potted plants before Mingli Hall, its brilliance causing the golden hairpin by Li Jianting's temple to sparkle. She turned to the side and gazed at Xue Xiuzhuo, who was standing at the foot of the hall. Xue Xiuzhuo's back was as straight as a ramrod, his shoulders bearing the last of the light, his official robe shrouded under the remaining rays of the setting sun. Li Jianting could not get a clear look at his expression.

"Teacher," Li Jianting raised a hand to lift the beaded curtain, "this way, please."

There were no lamps lit in Mingli Hall, nor was there anyone waiting in attendance. Upon entering, Xue Xiuzhou knelt before the emperor's desk, but Li Jianting did not return to the throne. She stood at the side of her desk and looked at the calligraphy painting on the wall.

"Xue Xiuyi's transgressions have nothing to do with Teacher," Li Jianting said. "If Teacher is here to apologize, it is not at all necessary."

"Xue Xiuyi is corrupt and took bribes. The Ministry of Justice has ordered the arrest of the Juexi merchants who are involved in this case. They have, however, turned up empty." Unlike the others who prostrated themselves over the ground, Xue Xiuzhuo knelt with his back straight, just like the way he did when he was teaching Li Jianting in his residence. "Your Majesty has ordered the Capital Command Troops to assist in this case. Naturally, this has nothing to do with this humble subject."

"The numbers of memorials impeaching Teacher of late are as numerous as the numbers of hairs on an ox. Over ten criminal charges against Teacher are listed. But Teacher sounds to me to be civilized and composed," Li Jianting gazed at the painting. "Presumably, you must have long anticipated it."

"One tends to think of change in times of adversity,"<sup>103</sup>

The light in Mingli Hall disappeared, hiding both of them under the obscure darkness. The palace lanterns hanging under the corners of the eaves outside the hall were not lit, and the entire palace seemed to be in a deep sleep. The towering palace rested against the backdrop of faint light on the horizon. There were no songs of the birds to be heard, nor human voices.

“You once saved the thirteen cities of Juexi with Jiang Qingshan, and took down Hua Siqian with Hai Liangyi. You also went without sleep and rest in order to investigate the eight cities’ field taxes. There is no one else in this world who understands better than you just how tough it is to eliminate the chronic ailment that is the noble clans.” Li Jianting raised a finger to touch the calligraphy painting with Emperor Guangcheng’s imperial seal on it. “You insisted on pursuing the accounts in spite of opposition on the imperial court, and you did it all just to give me an opportunity to win over the long-time ministers.”

Every matter had an order of importance and urgency. Han Cheng and the Empress Dowager fell from power one after another, and the noble clans had no one else to take up the mantle. They were already showing signs of self-defeating fatigue, one that would lead to its own collapse, and Xue Xiuzhou understood it better than anyone else.

“You successively submitted memorials requesting to rescind the Fei clan’s former rank of nobility, seal their properties for confiscation, and execute their entire clan,” Li Jianting slid the pulp of her finger around, dragging out fingerprints on the painting, “which consequently caused the noble clans to be particularly resentful towards you, and you did that also to give me the opportunity to share a common enemy with them.”

The Fei clan of Dancheng, the Han clan of Wucheng, and the Hua clan of Dicheng—these were the main forces of the noble clans the Grand Secretariat and Xue Xiuzhuo assisted Li Jianting before and after her ascension to the throne to expel in one go. Now that they were forced to de-escalate the tension with the noble clans owing to the threat from Zhongbo, someone had to shoulder the responsibility for their past feud.

Li Jianting looked back and said, “Teacher means to sacrifice himself to help me secure my throne.”

The palace lanterns at the corners of the eaves were finally lit, and the faint light peeked through the beaded curtains to shine upon Xue Xiuzhuo’s back in a mosaic of mottled light. His back was skinny, and his official robe was old. He was like a pine nailed to Qudu, standing unwaveringly in the wind.

He gazed at that painting and said, "To safeguard the state, one should not begrudge the sacrifices made."

It was said that those who posed a threat to the emperor at the top and lorded it over the imperial court at the bottom were ministers in power. Majority held a tight grip on an enormous amount of power and did not comply with the rules of propriety. They overstepped their authority and formed cliques. In this vein, Hua Siqian was a minister in power. If Li Jianting was just as indecisive and weak-willed as Emperor Xiande and Emperor Tianchen had been, Xue Xiuzhuo could have opted to become a minister in power too. However, Li Jianting was not.

Perhaps, at certain points in time, Dazhou needed a gentle and mild emperor, but not in the here and now, where the pack of wolves were lying in wait for opportunities to strike. If Li Jianting could not be strong-willed and decisive, then all she could do was to be a puppet subjected to the manipulations of the court ministers. In that case, she would be utterly unworthy of sitting here on the throne.

"There are the imperial censors for admonishments and the court ministers for government administration. Only the Imperial College is not above the imperial court, yet it can help facilitate the discussion of political affairs worldwide. If the reputation of the imperial college is dependent on a single official, then he is the wolf that can influence the sovereign's policy-making decisions. That is why this humble subject has to stand isolated from the entire body of ministers." Xue Xiuzhuo's eyes were extremely calm. His calm, however, was not like that of ordinary people. It was more like he already knew of the path that lay ahead, and for that reason, he would not budge even if the others were to cast stones at him or spurn him.

A prestigious reputation might seem elusive, but in truth, it was also the key to forming a political faction. Hai Liangyi never formed cliques when he was alive. He did not even meet the court officials after returning to his residence every day. But was he really factionless? The gathering of those of humble origins, the political orientation of the imperial college, and the fact that Yao Wenyu could recruit all the virtuous talents in the world for Shen Zechuan, all bore the mark of Hai Liangyi's prestigious reputation at play.

Xue Xiuzhuo's appraisals when he served as the Chief Supervising Secretary of the Ministry of Revenue were all outstanding. He rendered meritorious service in straightening up Juexi and revitalizing its thirteen cities during the reign of Xiande, and then he made meritorious achievements by auditing the field taxes and returning the fields to the common folks during the reign of Shengyin. He used this "reputation", and he knew very well the power of inciting "social movements".

Li Jianting suddenly turned back and asked, "Does Teacher not fear death?"

To date, no one had ever asked Xue Xiuzhuo this question. He looked at Li Jianting and answered, "Court officials die for the state."<sup>104</sup>

To safeguard the state, one should not begrudge the sacrifices made.

Xue Xiuzhou did not begrudge this life of his and even this lifetime's worth of reputation—he could bear to give them all up.

Li Jianting was silent for a moment. "I respect Teacher, and I, too, do not begrudge it."

"Objects that do not hit its limit will not reverse its course; evil that has not reached its peak will not meet its demise."<sup>105</sup>

Yao Wenyu scribbled rapidly, his handwriting a scrawl. The ground of the inner chamber was all paved with paper. His brush-holding hand trembled ever so slightly. Finally, he abandoned the brush and covered his lips to cough violently.

Opportunity, opportunity.

Qi Shiyu wanted the Qi clan to keep inheriting Qi Zhuyin's "Prince of Donglie" title. He was far more cautious than Xiao Fangxu, and even at this point, he could still exercise patience to observe the situation. Shen Zechuan had just won over the hearts of the people from the six prefectures with the Duanzhou battle. To completely disassociate himself from the two words "Shen Wei", he had to be benevolent and righteous to the end. So even when Tantai Hu's Dunzhou's garrison troops arrived at the Beiyuan military drill grounds, he could not take the first move to mobilize troops. And besides, as long as Qi Zhuyin did not move, the 300,000-strong Qidong Garrison Troops would be a blade to the south of Zhongbo.

Opportunity, opportunity.

The Prefectural Lord wanted an opportunity to completely eradicate the latent threat.

The sound of Yao Wenyu's coughs was short and urgent. No longer holding the brush, he merely covered his mouth with a handkerchief.

Qiao Tianya had only just arrived tonight, and the moment he dismounted his horse and entered the courtyard, he heard the coughing inside the room.

"Did no one prepare the medicine for Mister?" Fei Sheng asked the maidservant in the courtyard.

"He only took half a bowl," the maidservant answered in a soft-spoken voice, "then he kept himself inside the room and said not to disturb him."

Qiao Tianya pushed the door open. The woolen rug was all covered with fallen paper pages. Fei Sheng, who was following behind, bent over to pick them up, only to see them crammed with words all over. He could not help but blurt out in astonishment, "Is Mister planning to author a book..."

Qiao Tianya was already in the inner chamber. Yao Wenyu's handkerchief was stained red. He shoved aside the wheelchair and picked Yuanzhuo up in his arms.

To Fei Sheng, he said, "Call Jiran!"

For some reason, when Yao Wenyu tilted his head back, his nose suddenly started bleeding. Qiao Tianya pulled away Yao Wenyu's hand, which had been covering his mouth and nose—it was damp and cold.

By this time, it was already late in the night. Jiran had long gone to bed.

Qiao Tianya did not dare to wait. With Yao Wenyu in his arms, he leaped down the steps and ran towards Jiran's courtyard.

With eyes half-closed, Yao Wenyu turned his head aside to burrow into his chest, murmuring, "... Fei Sheng... pass the message..."

Qiao Tianya ran until he was sweating all over. He reached out a hand to cup the other side of Yao Wenyu's face, as if he wanted to hold Yuanzhuo down in his bosom.

Fei Sheng went on ahead and ascended the steps. Pounding on the door, he shouted, "Open up! Wake the little monk up now!"

The young male servant watching the door did not dare to tarry and ran to shout for Jiran after moving the latch out of the way. Jiran was bundled up in his monk robe when he stepped out. With eyes bleary from sleep, he said, "This humble monk does not see patients at night—oh! What happened to Mister?!"

By the time Shen Zechuan hurried over, it was almost dawn. Dressed in a wide robe, he saw Yao Wenyu sleep soundly in the inner chamber and motioned for everyone to head over to the side hall.

“Expending yourself mentally can easily shorten your life,” Jiran said. “The poison Mister is inflicted with is called ‘late return’. As the name implies, it’s just the opposite of ‘swift pursuit’. This poison is late to come and slow to disperse. It has been over a year now, right?”

“It should be a year and a half now,” Fei Sheng still remembered, “... starting from the time in Dancheng.”

Jiran set down the brush, put his palms together, and bowed to Shen Zechuan, saying truthfully, “When this humble monk first saw Mister, his wrists were already showing shades of blue. Your Lordship, this humble monk can’t cure this poison and swift pursuit.”

The color drained from all the faces in the side hall.

In his trance, Yao Wenyu heard the sound of rain. He dreamed of Mount Bodhi. It was as if he closed his eyes, all that greeted his sight would be the endless rain. The cloudy fog among the mountains covered the green bamboo from view. Mud stained his sleeves as he stood in the face of the wind. He felt damp all over, but he could not tell if it was his sweat, or the rain.

“A spring and an autumn<sup>106</sup> have since passed with our last parting.” The sighing of the bamboo sang behind him. Hai Liangyi stood at a far distance. “And now Yuanzhuo is back.”

Yao Wenyu looked back. The refreshing breeze sent his wide sleeves billowing. He greeted, “Teacher.”

Hai Liangyi stood with his hands behind his back. His short beard had already gone white. He was not wearing his official robe, just like the year he led Yao Wenyu by the hand into the academy; there was even a zhaowen bag<sup>107</sup> hung around his waist. “I heard the wind rouse, and that was how I knew you were back.”

The sighing of the wind among the bamboo forest was too loud. Hai Liangyi’s figure lay concealed within, leaving only Yao Wenyu standing alone. The mountain fog was dense. Yao Wenyu looked into the far distance at the imperial palace in Qudu. He once climbed to a high spot to look far out, but he only saw the picturesque mountain scenery in the twilight. It was only now that he realized just how vast and expansive the world was.

“Wait for me, Teacher,” Yao Wenyu said. “Once the rain stops...”

The sound of the zither suddenly rang out. The scene before Yao Wenyu’s eyes vanished, and he landed back onto this bed of his. The partially covered window kept out the sunlight. He did not have the sensation of waking up when he opened his eyes; on the contrary, he felt as if he had fallen into a dream. Several times, he closed his eyes. Eventually, he said, “Songyue, it’s already the hour of si.”

Qiao Tianya pressed down on the zither strings and said, “You have gone all confused from a messed up sleep schedule. Don’t you usually call me Qiao Tianya?”

“The moon over the pines<sup>108</sup> lends to the chill of the night; the wind and the spring,<sup>109</sup> in a melodious chorus, sing.” Yao Wenyu said. “This name is too lonely.”<sup>110</sup>

“I once had a friend named Shao Fengquan.” Qiao Tianya strummed the zither strings, which elicited a series of random sounds but did not form a tune. “A pity he died.”

Yao Wenyu listened to that disarray of zither sounds and asked, “You play the zither. Does he play it too?”

“I don’t remember anymore,” Qiao Tianya said. “The only one who can play the zither for you, however, can only be me, Qiao Tianya.”

Yao Wenyu looked at him. “You have yet to teach me the tune you were going to teach me back then during our first encounter in spring.”

Qiao Tianya stopped and looked at Yao Wenyu as he answered, “It’s still not too late now.”

Xue Xiuyi did not give a clear account. The residences of those merchants were all empty. Qudu required proof of household registration for access in and out of the city. The Capital Command Troops kept guard for three days, but they never did find those people. These merchants who had wantonly squandered their money on Donglong Street seemed to have vanished into thin air.

Kong Qiu received Xue Xiuzhuo’s request in the office compound. He set the teacup down and considered it for a moment. “Let him go.”

When the official returning his reply left, Cen Yu said from opposite him, “I fear it’s inappropriate to let Xue Xiuzhuo have a hand in this case at present.”

“This matter concerns the inner court, and the amount of silver involved is large. After the Ministry of Justice formulates the charges, they will definitely want a joint trial by the Three Judicial Offices.” Kong Qiu picked up the teacup again. “Xue Xiuzhuo is the Court of Judicial Review Vice Minister. Since he has not been suspended from duty, he has the authority to supervise and investigate.”

“Xue Xiuyi is his eldest brother, after all. He ought to avoid drawing suspicion to himself.” Cen Yu held his knees. “Furthermore, the amount of memorials impeaching him are increasing of late.”

“Not that I’m insinuating anything, but Xunyi, the Chief Surveillance Bureau ought to be dealt with too.” Kong Qiu took several sips of tea. “It’s not wrong to impeach Xue Xiuyi for corruption and bribery that day on the imperial court, but dragging in Xue Xiuzhuo inevitably makes it look like there’s personal grudge at play too. Look at those words spouted; every single one is groundless.”

“Xue Xiuzhuo is a man of extraordinary merits, and he comes from a noble clan,” Cen Yu said. “Those who hate him are only all too anxious to trample on him. If Her Majesty had been willing to rebuke him a word or two when dealing with Xue Xiuyi, it wouldn’t have gone as far as to cause such a mass outrage.”

Unable to taste the tea in his mouth, Kong Qiu set down the teacup and said after a moment of silence, “To begin with, a direct remonstrance is not the way to go for this matter. Xue Xiuzhuo audited the field taxes and returned the fields to the commoners in the cities of Dancheng, Wucheng, and Chuancheng. Yongcheng suffered a drought this year, and Jiang Qingshan encountered difficulties in trying to borrow grains, begging from all quarters in Qudu. Even so, both of them did not touch the grains allocated to the common folks of the three cities. The people all remember him, and they are even willing to erect a longevity tablet<sup>111</sup> to honor him at home. Her Majesty has only just refuted his memorial to continue pursuing the field taxes, and to ease the situation, she rewarded Jiang Qingshan. If she were to censure Xue Xiuzhuo now because of that scoundrel Xue Xiuyi, the people of the three cities would object. Besides, it’s common knowledge that Xue Xiuzhuo and Xue Xiuyi are on bad terms with one another, and they have long divided up the family properties to live apart. You imperial censors want Her Majesty to dismiss Xue Xiuzhuo from office pending an investigation because of this matter, but if Her Majesty did as you asked, wouldn't she be cold-hearted and ungrateful for casting him aside once he has served his purpose? Xue Xiuyi colluded with Fuman to commit embezzlement and bribery, and Her Majesty immediately ordered the Ministry of Justice to investigate. She has not shown any intent to shield Xue Xiuyi for Xue Xiuzhuo's sake either. Investigate what ought to be investigated and kill those who ought to be killed. You can't push others into too tight a corner."

Cen Yu could tell from Kong Qiu's words that he meant to protect Xue Xiuzhuo, so he said, "The imperial censor remonstrated only because he feared Her Majesty will show favoritism and side with Xue Xiuzhuo. If Her Majesty listens to Xue Xiuzhuo in every matter, it will mess up the order of hierarchy between the sovereign and her subjects. Besides, Her Majesty showed favor towards Fuman a few days ago, but didn't Fuman forget his place and do wrong still?"

Kong Qiu pointed at Cen Yu. "That's right. It's because Her Majesty favored and trusted Fuman that Fuman would commit one mistake after another, but this time, you're not seeing it clearly. Let me ask you, who is Fuman? He was on good terms with Xiao Chiye at the beginning, yet he could switch allegiances to Han Cheng and lured Xiao Chiye into the palace, and he could also turn around and kill Han Cheng for the sake of his own future prospects and life—the poisoning case was left inconclusive; Her Majesty might not have pursued it, but she is no fool. Fuman is highly reputable among the inner court yamen, and his godsons and god-grandsons are everywhere. Most importantly, he is a eunuch with power and influence who has served in two reigns, waiting in attendance by the Son of Heaven's side. He holds the endorsement rights<sup>112</sup> that will permit him to reject the Grand Secretariat's memorandums. Right now, Her Majesty is the prime of her life, but what about after? Any oversight while retaining such a vile character by the side will result in physical harm or worse, the ruin of state foundation! Even if Her Majesty doesn't kill him, I will kill him!"

As Kong Qiu spoke, he stood up and paced a couple of steps.

"Shen Zechuan mass deployed troops to the Beiyuan military drill grounds. How long can the 40,000 new soldiers in Qudu hold up for? We have to ask Commander-in-chief Qi to mobilize troops to come to Her Majesty's aid. When Commander-in-chief Qi sent troops to fight the Qingshu Tribe the last time, Xue Xiuzhuo was the one who forked out the military salaries and provisions, and now that we want to get past Tianfei Watchtower to fight Zhongbo, we still have to ask Xue Xiuzhuo for the military salaries and provisions!”

The warden from the Ministry of Justice was familiar with Xue Xiuzhuo and opened the doors for him. “Is Your Excellency here to see Custodian Xue? As long as you have a memorandum, I’ll go open the doors now.”

Xue Xiuzhuo looked along the warden’s arm for just a fleeting moment before he withdrew his gaze and said, “I am here to see Yingxi.”

The warden did not ask too many questions. After looking through the memorandum, he led Xiu Xiuzhuo inside and unlocked the cell door for him. “As Yingxi-gonggong still has an ongoing case, he is not locked up with the others. Your Excellency, this way.”

Xue Xiuzhuo lowered his head and entered the cramped, narrow cell.

Yingxi’s prisoner attire was filthy, and he had been tortured. At present, he was lying inside with his arms and legs curled up. On hearing movements, he shuddered and jolted up into a sitting position, covering his head as he cowered out of the way and shouted, “I’m guilty, guilty! Don’t hit me!”

Xue Xiuzhuo looked around.

Yingxi saw Xue Xiuzhuo through the gap between his arms and immediately scrambled off the bed to kneel at his feet and pleaded, “Your Excellency, is Your Excellency here to investigate the case? I’m guilty! Guilty!” Shaking the chains, he pointed at his own face. “But this time I was wrongly accused!”

He clenched at Xue Xiuzhuo’s official robe until it was all creased.

Xue Xiuzhuo lowered his eyes to look at Yingxi. “A final judgment has not been reached for your crimes yet. I’m going to ask you a few questions. If you can answer me truthfully, I will put in a mitigation plea to the officials from the Ministry of Justice.”

Yingxi hurriedly nodded, his gaze following Xue Xiuzhuo as he answered, “I will tell you all I know! Everything I did was all at the Lao-zuzong’s behest!”

“Who was the one who sent you to Qidong to supervise the army?”

“The, the former emperor...” Yingxi answered. “The former emperor sent me to Qidong to supervise the army, and the Lao-zuzong was the one who recommended me for it. The Lao-zuzong said with us father and son on the inside and the outside, we will no longer have to worry about our meals, nor put ourselves at other people's beck and call."

Xue Xiuzhuo continued to ask, "Were you the one who swapped out the military grains in the Bianjun Commandery?"

How would Yingxi have expected Xue Xiuzhuo to ask about this? He released his grip and started cowering back, his gaze evasive as he hedged, "I'm merely an army-supervising eunuch... how would I dare to swap the military grains..." He looked at Xue Xiuzhuo's displeased expression and unexpectedly blurted out to implicate other people, "I... I did not force that Lu Guangbai to defect!"

Xue Xiuzhuo bent over to grab Yingxi's arm. He probed again, "Were you the one who swapped out the military grains in the Bianjun Commandery?"

Yingxi's breathing was short and urgent. Unable to avoid it, he could only wipe his tears and snot and answered with deep remorse, "This matter really isn't up to me, Your Excellency, Your Excellency! I only knew that I had to swap the grain wagons, but who knew it was all moldy rice inside! If I had known it beforehand, I would not have dared to switch it even if you endowed me with ten guts!" When he spoke to this point, he recalled the constant fear and anxiety he had been under this year and could not help but shed tears as he sniveled, "The Lao-zuzong has really put me in hot water! Commander-in-chief Qi took me into custody. I, I'm just the scapegoat taking the blame for Fuman. He has a guilty conscience, so naturally, he wanted to save me."

Xue Xiuzhuo had been investigating the Bianjun Commandery's military grains case all this time. There were no problems with all the Ministry of War officials involved. It was only until Yingxi re-entered the palace that he remembered the army-supervising eunuch.

Scorpion!

Xue Xiuzhuo stared at Yingxi as he asked, "What are you planning to do by entering the palace?"

Yingxi shook his head vigorously, his face a wretched sight as he choked with sobs and answered, "It's not me, not me! It was really at Fuman's behest that I entered the palace this time. Your Excellency, he wrote a letter to me in the sixth month, wanting me to take care of the flowers and plants in his courtyard on his behalf. He was waiting to use them in the ninth month to win his master's favor! I really came here this time to deliver the flowers!"

"You people have been hiding in Qudu." Xue Xiuzhuo raised his voice. "Who else do you still want to kill?"

Yingxi's arm was hurting from Xue Xiuzhuo's grip. He bawled, "I don't know! I don't know! I was wrongly accused!"

"How about Shen Zechuan?" The expression in Xue Xiuzhuo's eyes grew increasingly grim. "Is Shen Zechuan a Scorpion too?"

Yingxi shook his head haphazardly as he struggled. "I have nothing to do with the rebels! I swear to Heaven, I'm in no way associated with the rebels!"

"Was Xiao Chiye's nomination of Fuman into office also instigated by Shen Zechuan?"

In the instant Yingxi pushed and shoved at Xue Xiuzhuo, Xue Xiuzhuo felt a chill creep down his spine. Things that he could not figure out now all seemed to click together.

"And that relay report that told on Wei Huaigu." The expression in Xue Xiuzhuo's eyes was terrifying. "You eunuchs were the one who swapped the tags and had the Ministry of Justice switched to the Ministry of Revenue. The aim was to make Wei Huaigu turn himself in. You were cutting off the tail to keep the Scorpions safe. It was Fuman... It was the eunuchs!"

No wonder there were no traces to be found on the imperial court.

Fuman had his head lowered as he gasped for breath when a bucket of salt water suddenly splashed over his face. He was wounded all over, and the pain caused him to yell out, but as his limbs were all bound, he could only cuss at the top of his voice, "—You son of a bitch!"

Fengquan threw aside the bucket and scoffed, "You're no decent cur either."

"It's all because of you," Fuman's voice was shrill, "that I'm in such dire straits today!"

"You did it to yourself." Fengquan smacked Fuman's face condescendingly. "Just a mere few years old bastard, and you dare to call yourself the Lao-zuzong. Seems to me you're tired of living."

Fuman could not hold his face straight from Fengquan's smack. Such a smack like this that used moderate strength did not hurt like a slap would, but it was much more humiliating. Blood saturated Fuman's mouth. Spewing a mouthful of blood, he said, "Just you wait. Her Majesty—"

"Wait for Her Majesty to raid your properties and execute your family." Fengquan leaned in and whispered, "Do you think no one knows you poisoned Her Majesty? You set me up and had me thrown into prison, so anxious were you for me to die. Do you think Her Majesty can't see through you?" He started laughing oddly, as if he loathed Fuman to the death. "Once your family is wiped, we can move on to all nine generations of your clan."

Fuman spat out a few mouthfuls of teeth that had come loose and said, "Bull-fucking-shit, you despicable thing! It wasn't me..." Gasping heavily for breath, he tilted his head back and shouted, "It wasn't me!"

"Who else can it be if not you?" Fengquan took several steps back. "You were the one who received Han Cheng's 'swift pursuit'. Han Cheng gave it to you, wanting you to add it to Her Majesty's meal. Once she was killed, the Capital Command Troops would immediately be able to kill the officials of the Grand Secretariat on grounds of rushing to the emperor's aid. So you poisoned Her Majesty's food and almost killed her."

"I know my own limits..." Fuman was so resentful his voice trembled. As he looked at Fengquan's expression, his eyes gradually widened. "It's you... You were the one who added the poison..."

Fuman was in two minds between Li Jianting and the noble clans. He did not dare to disobey Han Cheng, but he did not dare to poison Li Jianting for real either; thus, he had "swift pursuit" swapped over to a common poison, and he only added a little, so it was not all that deadly.

Fengquan, whose face lay concealed in the darkness, revealed his pearly white teeth. "You are the Lao-zuzong, the great forefather. I am the little zuzong."<sup>113</sup>

Fuman wished with a vehemence to tear Fengquan apart with his hands. Clanging the chains hard, he snapped, "Yingxi is your bitch!"

"Tsk." Fengquan made nothing of Fuman. "The one who brought him up single-handedly is the 'Lao-zuzong'. He's so overwhelmed with gratitude for you he doesn't acknowledge me at all."

"I have been wronged..." Fuman could not hold back his cries as he wailed sorrowfully, "Your Majesty, I am innocent!"

Unaccustomed to the stench of blood, Fengquan covered his nose as he advised, "Since you have confessed to it all, I will present your statement as is to Her Majesty." He turned around and summoned the warden in. "The Lao-zuzong is advanced in age. Don't apply any more heavy torture. The various excellencies have yet to declare him guilty, so we must follow procedures. He keeps threatening suicide, and I fear he will bite off his tongue to kill himself before he can even be beheaded."

That former subordinate from the Eastern Depot was advanced in age too. Bowing to Fengquan's wish, he snickered, "We are experts at this, so don't worry, Feng-gonggong. I guarantee he will live until his execution. As for biting off his tongue to kill himself, all we have to do is to just have to cut off his tongue to preempt it, isn't it?"

Fengquan looked back and replied, "Then I shall have to trouble you."

Fuman watched the eunuch approach and cried out in terror, "Without permission from the Ministry of Justice, how dare you, how dare all of you —"

The door slammed shut with a loud clank.

It was night.

Xue Xiuzhuo was waiting in the office compound for Kong Qiu's official reply in writing. He wanted to see Fuman tonight, so he had to have the memorandum from the Grand Secretary. This was long past working hours, but the Grand Secretariat had yet to break off for a rest due to the increase of troops at the Beiyuan military drill grounds.

"Fuman tried to bite off his tongue to commit suicide yesterday, and a merciless official<sup>114</sup> took matters into his own hand and cut off his tongue." Kong Qiu took time away from his hectic paperwork and said to Xue Xiuzhuo, "Even if you go now, you can't get anything out of him. Fortunately, they recorded his confession statement before they applied the torture. Should you wish to take a look at it, I'll get the Ministry of Justice to pass it to you."

Xue Xiuzhuo froze for a moment when he took the memorial, then frowned and asked, "How can he take matters into his own hands when it is a matter of this magnitude? Who was the official who applied the torture?"

"A young man in the prime of his youth." Kong Qiu frowned too. "That was really one ruthless move. The Ministry of Justice has already dismissed him from office."

Such a coincidence?

Xue Xiuzhuo turned his head to the side. "I'll go take a look—"

“Put everything else aside first!” Cen Yu ran through the door all drenched in sweat; even the sides of his temples were soaked through. He stuffed a paper he was clenching before Kong Qiu and said in an urgent tone, “Boran, look. Isn’t this a disaster?!”

“The reigning emperor comes from the common people. Who can truly prove without a doubt that her lineage is authentic? We only have Xue Xiuzhuo’s words for it!” Rumors in the streets spread fast. In the course of a night, almost everyone was holding that paper of unknown origin. “Xue Xiuzhuo can’t be trusted either. Just look at his eldest brother, Xue Xiuyi. What is he? The national rat that almost made the Grand Secretary pass out from anger.”

“Didn’t they all say that the current emperor looks like Emperor Yongyi?”<sup>115</sup> An old man with a walking stick craned his neck. “The various excellencies from the Grand Secretariat have given the nod too.”

This teahouse was in a mess. Ge Qingqing stroked his newly grown beard as he said, “Yeah, and the little girl from that butcher household in front looks like the former emperor too! It has been over ten years since Emperor Yongyi was alive. Don’t they all have two eyes and one mouth when it really comes down to it? Seems to me like everyone here resembles him too.”

The students gathered around and read that piece of paper through. Each of them had their own ideas on the topic, and after several disputes, they actually went so far as to come to blows.

“The Xue clan dominates the imperial court, and you people are conspirators who are his accomplices in evil! You’re all sinners of Dazhou, condemned through the ages!” A student’s spittle spewed all over. “The national rat has already shown his face, and Her Majesty still doesn’t bring the Xue clan to justice. If this is not fear of them, then what?!”

“Xue, Xue...” The other party, who was being yanked by the collar in a crowd so cramped he was tottering, crumpled the torn paper in his hands and lifted it up high. “His Honorable Excellency Xue audited the field taxes and returned the fields to the common people. Who among us here can do that? You are all just despicable people slandering him! You people are the real sinners of Dazhou! Her Majesty did not punish His Honorable Excellency Xue because...”

“Screw your motherfucking balls!”

“Why are you people so insufferably vulgar?!”

Tables and chairs were thrown into disarray as the students traded blows with one another. Brushes and inkstones were knocked all over the ground. One misstep was all it took to end up in ink from head to toe. Doors and windows clattered noisily as the students bumped into them. A headmaster hurried in to calm the situation, but he had not even shouted a word when the repeated bumps and shoves from the students jostled him out of the door.

“Call for the Capital Command Troops,” the headmaster lifted the hem of his robe and stomped his foot as he urged. He was in such a state of anxiety that his neck was flushed red and he was sweating profusely. “Hurry, call the Capital Command Troops over! People are going to get killed!”

“His Honorable Excellency Xue is the beacon of light whose glory shines throughout the annals of history; he is a loyal subject!” Shreds of paper fluttered all over the air. A student stepped onto the chair and table to stand at a high spot, where he pointed all around him. “You people persecute loyal subjects based on a piece of unfounded nonsense. The state and society will be ruined at the hands of you vile...” He had yet to finish his sentence when an inkstone hurtling at him smashed into his head.

“It is indeed true that Xue Xiuyi colluded with the eunuchs to steal and sell treasures from the palace granaries.” The fired-up students could no longer tell who around them was in whose camp. “Xue Xiuzhuo is a rat too!”

The table flipped over with a thud, and the student lost his footing and fell to the ground. Before he could scramble to his feet, he was trampled upon by the jostling crowd of students.

“Don’t hurt others.” A few teachers from the sides pulled at the students. “You must not hurt the others!”

“What’s happening here...” The schoolmaster slapped his thigh, his tears coursing down his aged face. “Stop it now!”

The tinkling sound of the zither lingered in a never-ending loop in the air. Yao Wenyu played very slowly. The red thread on his wrist swayed at the opening of his sleeves. He had strummed away at the strings until his fingers turned red.

Qiao Tianya pressed down on the zither strings and said, "You missed a part."

Without waiting for Yao Wenyu to ask, he plucked a few strings beside Yao Wenyu's hand. Yao Wenyu, however, could still not remember it, so Qiao Tianya took Yao Wenyu's hand and led him into maneuvering the strings.

Yao Wenyu raised his eyes to look at him. "Have you ever taught others like this before?" He asked.

Qiao Tianya's palm was scalding hot, although when he smiled, it was still as carefree and unfettered. He cast a glance at Yao Wenyu and answered, "I did. Many of them."

"And no one ever told you," Yao Wenyu said, "that you're holding too tight?"

"Perhaps someone did," Qiao Tianya said, "but I don't remember."

"You forget fast." The back of Yao Wenyu's hand gradually rose in temperature too. "It's a good habit to have."

Qiao Tianya looked back at Yao Wenyu. In this brief exchange of gaze, he suddenly reached over the small table and kissed Yao Wenyu on the lips. The leaves in the courtyard rustled as they fell and landed on Qiao Tianya's back. He raised a hand to secure Yao Wenyu's chin in place.

The taste of medicine was bitter, as was Yao Wenyu.

This bitterness sprang from between their lips and tongues and dissolved in his chest, becoming a piercing pain. Qiao Tianya found it painful, and he thought the same for Yao Wenyu. As they kissed, he caressed Yao Wenyu's cheeks, as if he had never touched Yao Wenyu in such a way before and wanted to make up for it now.

"Do you have something to say to me?" Qiao Tianya stopped and touched the bridge of his nose with Yao Wenyu's.

"You're lying." Yao Wenyu's pale face broke into a smile. "I'm your first student."

Qiao Tianya smiled too.

"Qiao Tianya." Yao Wenyu raised his fingers to touch Qiao Tianya's eyes. "Seek not great merit in life, but a safe and smooth-sailing life blessed with honor, prosperity, and happiness. I wish you a life of great success<sup>116</sup> and longevity."

Qiao Tianya's expression remained unchanged, but the rims of his eyes had gone red. "Why don't you wish me luck in finding a good match and be blessed with a household full of children and grandchildren?”

Yao Wenyu did not wish to say.

“You’re lying too,” Qiao Tianya said. “You already knew how to play this tune.”

“Yuanzhuo has kept his spring date with you this life.” Yao Wenyu retracted his hand. “I have no more regrets.”

The wind brushed past them, sending both of their sleeves and robes fluttering.

They were clearly this close together, and yet, they were so very far apart.

Credit: Thanks to Katie82 and fukixie for spotting the typo! <3

◇ CHAPTER 269: METASTASIS ◇

Not even the ban imposed by the imperial court could stop the gossip from spreading like wildfire around Qudu. Everyone in the streets and alleys, pleasure quarters and teahouses were all discussing the female emperor's birth origins. The city gates were sealed off, but the rumor still made its way to the eight cities and was now spreading to Juexi.

"Have the Capital Command Troops seal the gates as soon as possible," Kong Qiu said during the discussion in Mingli Hall. "The news must not be indiscriminately spread! The Imperial College caused such a commotion the Capital Command Troops had to intervene. Chengbi is a long-time minister. He knows how to handle the situation."

Shao Chengbi knelt before the emperor's desk. The new official robe he was wearing fitted him, but his hair was all white, and he did not look at all like a military general. His voice was very hoarse as he said, "It's not the first time the students have stirred up trouble. It's hard to get a right handle on it. My fear is that it might just end up adding fuel to the fire when the soldiers arrive."

"Even so, you have to intervene." Cen Yu stood up. He was an imperial censor, so he naturally understood the stakes involved. "Public opinions can obscure the truth, and repeated slanders can bring about one's ruin!"

Li Jianting did not sleep last night. She sat behind her table and drank strong tea, finishing it in a few mouthfuls. "I have a clear conscience, but the way the rumors started this time is fishy. Who exactly wrote that paper? Does the Ministry of Justice still not have a clue?"

“It’s being copied all over now,” Kong Qiu said. “We don’t know whose handwriting it is.”

“It’s true that there is nowhere to trace the handwriting.” Xue Xiuzhuo looked at Cen Yu. “But Your Excellency Cen, please take a look at this article again carefully.”

Cen Yu was burning up with anxiety when he saw this piece of paper last night, so where would he have the time to look it over carefully? On hearing Xue Xiuzhuo say so, however, he took over the article and read it again. After looking at it for a while, he suddenly jolted to his feet and took a few steps while holding the article in hand. “The article that made paper expensive<sup>117</sup> in Qudu a few years ago was the ‘Lamentation of Chashi’. This article seemed to be from the same hand as the ‘Lamentation of Chashi’.”

Kong Qiu vaguely remembered such a person and said hesitantly, “Is it that...”

“The ‘Eloquent Brush’ Gao Shenwei.” Cen Yu turned back. “It’s Gao Zhongxiong!”

Gao Zhongxiong had grandiose ambitions but little skill. He served as Han Jin’s aide in Qudu and caused the Eight Great Training Divisions to end up getting trounced by Xiao Chiye. Han Cheng meant to deal with him at that time, and Gao Zhongxiong struggled to keep himself alive in Dancheng. Who could have expected him to eventually throw in his lot with Shen Zechuan?!

“What’s of top priority now is not only to stifle the rumors but also to convince Commander-in-chief Qi to mobilize troops as soon as possible,” Kong Qiu said. “Shen Zechuan has the 120,000 garrison troops of Zhongbo in his grasp. No matter what, we cannot fight them head-on when it comes to military strength.”

“I have already issued an edict to Qidong,” Li Jianting said, “telling the Prince of Donglie to send troops across Tianfei Watchtower to launch a direct assault on Dengzhou.”

Zhongbo had no reinforcements. Shen Zechuan dispatched the Dunzhou garrison troops over to Cizhou and left the Imperial Cavalry to guard Duanzhou, leaving Fanzhou and Dengzhou inevitably empty.

“There’s no need to panic just yet,” Chen Zhen said. “The Zhongbo garrison troops are newly established too. Shen Zechuan only has the Dunzhou and Cizhou garrison troops available for use. He doesn’t even dare to mobilize the Chazhou garrison troops rashly. Chengbi, the 40,000

Capital Command Troops are at your disposal. We are practically evenly matched with Shen Zechuan!”

“I’m worried Shen Zechuan still has something up his sleeve.” Li Jianting rose to help up Shao Chengbi. “All I can do now is entrust Qudu to Viceroy Shao.”

“This old subject shall sacrifice my life to repay Your Majesty’s kindness.” Shao Chengbi limped. “There is no time to lose. This old subject will head out of the city tonight on horseback and hurry over to Dancheng, but before I leave, I have a favor to ask.”

As Li Jianting looked at Shao Chengbi’s aged face, she suddenly felt a surge of emotions for some unknown reason. Supporting Shao Chengbi by the arm, she said in an emotional moment, “This battle is dangerous. Regardless of success or failure, as long as I am still here, I will definitely redress the injustice Viceroy Shao has suffered.”

“This old subject is already old. It’s all because of the favor Your Majesty showed me that I can still do my utmost for my country. As for the rest, I will leave it to fate.” Shao Chengbi’s expression was grave and solemn. “This old subject would like to request to open up the Chunquan Battalion armory.”

Li Jianting was slightly taken aback.

“Chunquan Battalion is equipped with firearms,” Shao Chengbi said. “This old subject would like to take this batch of firearms with me.”

“You have my approval.” Li Jianting promptly turned around and called for Fengquan to bring the wine over. She personally poured a cup for Shao Chengbi. “I shall wait in Qudu for Viceroy Shao to return in victory!”

Gao Zhongxiong set down his brush and said to Yao Wenyu, “In Yuanzhuo’s opinion, how will Qudu fight this battle?”

“First, quell the rumors, then persuade Commander-in-chief Qi to mobilize troops,” Yao Wenyu turned his wheelchair to the other end of the table and spread out the map, “and have Shao Chengbi guard Dancheng. Xue Xiuzhuo will certainly make an issue of His Lordship’s background. He wants a justifiable reason to dispatch troops too.”

“There are indeed 40,000 garrison troop soldiers still left in Fanzhou and Dengzhou, but they are all new recruits, so we can only wait for Huo Lingyun to rush over to provide reinforcement.” Zhou Gui was a little worried as he sighed with emotion. “Xue Xiuzhuo returned the fields to the commoners. He has an excellent reputation in Dancheng. If the imperial court were to bring up Shen Wei, it'd be hard for us to counterattack."

Kong Ling then said, "They bestowed beneficence upon the three cities, but our benefactions extend to the six prefectures. His Lordship's contributions in the three territories are all tangible accomplishments. It's not something the new emperor can compare to. We were also the ones who joined forces with Libei and Qidong to win over the Chashi River's line of defense. Second Master has also made illustrious military achievements in bringing peace and stability to the Bianjun Commandery and advancing east into the desert. Zhongbo and Libei are unbeatable in terms of achievements."

Shen Zechuan sat alone in the principal seat, looking pensive.

"There is one more matter I can't figure out. The issue of commoners' fields in the three cities has just been settled," Zhou Gui pointed at Qudu. "However, the number of commoners forced to leave their homes for Zhongbo is still increasing instead of decreasing. What is the reason for this?"

"The noble clans have had jurisdiction over the eight cities for a long time. The so-called encroachment on the commoners' fields doesn't just refer to the eight great clans. The reason why the Grand Mentor implemented the census register system<sup>118</sup> back then was exactly to curb any attempts at field encroachment. The three cities of Dancheng, Wucheng, and Chuancheng had indeed straightened out their field taxes, but this sum of field tax was also forcibly imposed and collected by the Pan, Han, and Fei clans. In other words, there are still many 'bandits', who are affiliated with the noble clans but are not of noble birth themselves, stealing the commoners' fields, and they continue to make the common folks pay for this shortfall." Yao Wenyu looked at Shen Zechuan. "Since the noble clans have the name of 'chronic ailment' and 'deeply-rooted malady', they cannot be easily eradicated."

"Yuanzhuo has hit the nail on the head." Shen Zechuan lifted the lid to open up the teacup and covered it again. "It's not hard to implement the census register. The real difficulty lies in accounting for the yearly cumulative total, which requires internal regulations of government affairs and supervision in the data entry and submission of the reports. The selection of local officials in the various areas is also a top priority. Qudu has been caught up in the tussles between political factions in recent years, and those from the noble clans and those of humble origins have each suffered losses. By the time the new emperor ascended to the throne, the imperial court was empty and the key positions, vacant. Even if Xue Xiuzhuo does his utmost to turn the tide and save the desperate situation, he cannot do it alone.”

“Qudu can’t even pay the monthly salaries now,” Kong Ling said, “and they still have to bear the military expenses of the 40,000-strong Capital Command Troops. The longer it stretches on, the more strapped they will be. The commoners can’t prosper, and the silver treasury in Xue Xiuzhuo’s hands will not make it past winter this year.”

“At this stage,” Shen Zechuan said, “we are fighting a war of words. Let’s see how Qudu responds.”

The bamboo blinds rose gently, and Fei Sheng entered with a letter in hand. “Master, a letter from Second Master has arrived.”

Seeing as it was already late, Kong Ling rose with Zhou Gui and Gao Zhongxiong in tow and said to Shen Zechuan, “It’s too late today, and Your Lordship ought to retire for the night too, so we shall take our leave first.”

Shen Zechuan waited for them to leave one after another before opening Xiao Chiye’s letter. The moment the paper was spread open, a few tiny paper-folded wolves dropped out.

My wife, treat this letter as you would my person.

Shen Zechuan brushed his fingers over this line.

This expedition is dangerless. The Armored Cavalry has already arrived at Mosanchuan. We can reach Amu’er native place in the eleventh month. With the Huiyan Tribe as an example of the benefits of the mutual frontier trade, I have drawn over three desert tribes to our side, hoping to exhaust the combined strength of the three tribes to attack the bald vultures together. The provisions are ample, and the sweet potatoes are filling. The only thing, though, is that Lu Guangbai is way too noisy. If I can emerge victorious in one battle, I will be able to rush back home to spend the new year with you. Miss you.

Shen Zechuan looked at the bottom, where Xiao Chiye had used charcoal to scrawl a dark, starry night sky. Shen Zechuan read the few short lines repeatedly for a very long time. The candlelight shone upon the paper-cut window decoration. The night in Cizhou could still be considered refreshingly cool, but autumn was already setting in to the east of the Chashi River. Mosanchuan – or the Three Rivers of the Desert – were all barren shores with harsh sandstorms. He wondered if Xiao Chiye would be thin when he returned.

All the thousands upon thousands of words Shen Zechuan had to say dissolved into that phrase, “miss you”.

There was another official letter sealed with the commander’s seal behind Xiao Chiye’s letter from home. Shen Zechuan opened it to find that it was a letter from Lu Guangbai.

Several days later, the sound of horses’ hooves broke the silence. The cold night had not yet awoken. The man who reined in the horse produced his own authority token and shouted at the soldiers guarding the camp. “Tally of urgency<sup>119</sup> from the express dispatch station!<sup>120</sup> Hurry up and open the gates. I want to see the Prince of Donglie!”

Qi Zhuyin already had a premonition when she draped her clothes around herself. She lifted the curtains and stepped out, where she saw the authentication token from the express dispatch station against the cobalt blue sky.

“Military report?” She asked.

“Military report!” The official from the express dispatch station dismounted his horse and kneeled to pay his obeisance. In a loud voice, he said, “The Ministry of War has specially authorized the Prince of Donglie, Qi Zhuyin, to dispatch troops to Dengzhou to crush the Zhongbo rebels immediately!”

Qi Zhuyin pursed her lips lightly. She did not immediately answer.

The official from the express dispatch station then stood up and lifted the tally high. “As per the imperial decree, Her Majesty has appointed the Prince of Donglie to dispatch troops! “

“There are 40,000 Capital Command Troops right in Dancheng,” Qi Zhuyin said. “Why is Shao Chengbi not making a move? Tianfei Watchtower is a key natural barrier of Dazhou. Each time my troops pass through, it will deplete several tens of thousands in military salaries.”

“The Grand Secretariat has already given an official reply in writing to the Ministry of War; Qidong’s military salaries will arrive in a few days.” The official had an oblong face shape. Formerly Shao Chengbi’s old subordinate, he had come to ask Qi Zhuyin to deploy troops. He continued, neither obsequious nor supercilious, “The ambitions of the band of traitorous rebels are all too clear. Viceroy Shao’s stationing of his troops in Dancheng is, in fact, to guard Qudu. The traitor from the Shen clan is presently diverting his troops to Cizhou. His back is empty. As long as the Prince of Donglie sends troops, you can attack them from the front and the rear simultaneously with Viceroy Shao to besiege and annihilate the rebels.”

Qi Zhuyin did not answer.

The official pressed in a step closer. He wore a yellow belt bestowed by the emperor around his waist, along with a renowned blade bestowed by the emperor. Qi Wei promptly strode forth to stand before Qi Zhuyin and berated, “Remove your blade on seeing the prince!”

“My blade was bestowed by the Son of Heaven.” The official was not in the slightest afraid as he said coldly, “The rebels are threatening Qudu, and they have already forced their way before the emperor, so why is the Prince of Donglie unwilling to deploy troops to come to Her Majesty’s aid?” He abruptly yanked off the yellow belt. “The Qi clan takes orders from the Son of Heaven; you are a subject of Dazhou, so Qi Zhuyin, why are you not heeding the order?”

Qi Wei, having already lost his temper, snapped, “My lord’s honorable name is not something for you to call!”

The official stood tall and dauntless. “The state is in imminent danger! If the Prince of Donglie doesn’t dispatch troops, Dazhou will perish. When that time comes, the emperor is not the emperor, and the subject ceases to be the subject. You and I will merely be the slaves of a fallen empire. There will be no status and rank to speak of!”

Qi Wei was enraged. “Take him down—”

“Stand down!” Qi Zhuyin suddenly raised her hand, and the overcoat on her shoulders slid to the ground, revealing her regular wear and Zhujiu at the side of her waist. “Leave the tally behind,” she said. “I’ve got the message.”

Under the tense atmosphere, the official took the tally and presented it to Qi Zhuyin with both hands. He bowed again and said in a quiet voice, “This humble official shall wait in Dancheng for the Prince of Donglie to return in triumph.”

Having said that, he turned around and got on his horse. Without even drinking a drop of water, he spurred his horse on and set off on his return journey.

“This man is truly rude!” Qi Wei took two steps after him and looked back at Qi Zhuyin. “Commander-in-chief, why do you have to put up with it? Qudu is the one begging us to send troops right now!”

“He’s a decent official, composed in the face of danger and calm in the face of crisis. You should learn from him.” Qi Zhuyin flipped over the tally for a look. “We have been raising our horses and training our troops to this day, and all the food consumed has to be repaid.”

“So we are really going?” Qi Wei followed Qi Zhuyin closely. “Second Master is away on an expedition. Attacking Zhongbo now is to exploit another’s plight.”

“Exploitation is still a thing when you’re fighting a war?” Qi Zhuyin turned around to enter the military tent. She set the token on the table and looked at the map hanging on the wall. “Shen Zechuan lacks generals now. There’s only a Huo Lingyun who can temporarily stand in as Dengzhou’s commander, but the soldiers under his commands are not the best quality. Twenty thousand soldiers will be enough for us to fight Dengzhou.”

“I just fear...” Qi Wei started.

“Tantai Hu can’t be in two places at once,” Qi Zhuyin continued, “and Shen Zechuan has still yet to recover from his injuries. Once I make my move, Jiming will come.”

With the interruption from Qi Zhuyin, Qi Wei forgot what he was going to say and instead exclaimed in surprise, “The Hereditary Prince—I mean, the Prince is going to return to the battlefield?”

“Xiao Chiye left his beloved there.” Qi Zhuyin cast a glance at Qi Wei. “You think he’d dare to leave without a contingency plan?”

“Libei only has 30,000 Armored Cavalry left.” Qi Wei started to worry for Xiao Jiming. “The Prince of Libei is still in recuperation. If something were to happen to him, won’t the Princess Consort drown Qidong in her tears?”

Qi Wei could already imagine what Lu Yizhi would look like as she pounded Qi Zhuyin with her fists and bawled herself a river with her eyes shut.

“River of Ice Armored Cavalry, Xiao Jiming,” Qi Zhuyin said. “He’s the Xiao Jiming who sped through the snowy night and crossed the river to head down south to launch a sudden assault on the Biansha Cavalry. Even if Libei had only 5,000 Armored Cavalrymen left, he would still dare to come, let alone with 30,000 of them.”

Qi Wei was already at a loss what to do. He was not at all wishy-washy when fighting battles with the Biansha Cavalry, but with Libei...

“Commander-in-chief,” he said. “If we really come to blows, we will both suffer casualties. Leaving aside the troops who will sustain injuries and deaths, the common folk in both territories will also be in a state of panic and unease. Dengzhou did a good job straightening out the grain fields this year. We cross over, and people will still have to starve to death next year. Aren’t the officials from the capital all capable? Let them convince Shen Zechuan with their eloquence. The way it seems to me, Shen Zechuan will not move as long as the Capital Command Troops remain in place.”

“Then you have to understand one thing.” Qi Zhuyin turned around and said in all seriousness, “If we don’t fight this battle, you and I will be the slaves of a fallen empire. In the future, you and I will be subjects of a former reign, and the empire will see a change of surname thereafter. If we do not bow down to Shen Zechuan, we will have to kneel to Xiao Chiye.”

Qi Wei was struck dumb.

“Since time immemorial, loyalty and righteousness have struggled to co-exist.” Qi Zhuyin looked at the map again. “And this is a perfect example.”

The sounds of footsteps suddenly rang out at the door. Qi Wei turned his head back for a look.

“I heard an official from the express dispatch station has arrived.” Hua Xiangyi was in the midst of lifting the flap to enter. She was plainly dressed in white, mourning clothes, the contrast of which accentuated her delicate, dainty features.

“A-Yin, that’s a military report?”

Before Shao Chengbi left Qudu, Li Jianting had Fengquan pack his bags for him. In truth, however, Shao Chengbi had nothing to pack. All he brought along was a broadsword.

Fengquan washed Shao Chengbi’s hair for him, then tied his hair into a topknot before the bronze mirror. Shao Chengbi’s white hair was very rough.

He said, “I can’t grow it out when going onto the battlefield to kill the enemies. Might as well cut off some.”

So Fengquan had a junior eunuch bring a razor, which he used to cut Shao Chengbi’s hair short.

“Her Majesty asked you to see me off.” Shao Chengbi’s voice had gone all hoarse from the poison he took. It was not damaged to the point he could not speak, but his voice box was thoroughly ruined. "It is, in itself, a great kindness."

Soft shaving sounds came from the razor. Fengquan answered expressionlessly, "It is as Father says."

"This one parting stretches eternal." Shao Chengbi looked at Fengquan in the mirror. "Us father and son won't see each other again."

"Father is composed and steady in directing military operations. You will not lose." Fengquan carefully shaved Shao Chengbi's hair.

"Furthermore, the firearms of the Chunquan Battalion are all in Father's hands. They are enough to give Shen Zechuan a headache."

"He succeeds the Grand Mentor," Shao Chengbi said. "He is a formidable and ambitious man."

"The Grand Mentor might have been able to devise strategies from a command tent and score victories without a trace." White hair rustled as they fell to the ground. Fengquan wiped the blade with his thumb. The side of Shao Chengbi's neck was right within reach. "But he is afflicted with a disease that all intelligent people possess, and that is, conceit."

Shao Chengbi's blinded eye moved with great effort.

Fengquan kept away the razor and swiftly rolled Shao Chengbi's hair up to secure it in place.

Shao Chengbi sat quietly. The rays of the setting sun penetrated the window and drew a boundary line between Fengquan and him. Dust motes floated in the air.

"In the next life," Shao Chengbi said, "I will be your son."<sup>121</sup>

After a moment of silence, Fengquan answered, "Spare me."

Qudu took half a month to draft up the official proclamation and public denunciation, and the various yamens put it up in public. Other than the defeat of Shen Wei's troops, there were also mentions of Shen Zechuan's crimes, such as possessing his own troops under his own banner and forming a faction to plot a rebellion.

"The imperial court has shown kindness to the Shen clan, but the remaining survivor of the Shen clan proclaimed himself king in lands he seized with the intention of plotting a rebellion!" The junior yamen official struck the gong and shouted to those illiterate commoners. "He is now gathering bandits and pressing in towards Dancheng. He's a rebel and a traitor! From today onward, the Capital Command Troops will patrol the city and impose a curfew. No one is allowed to go out after the hour of you!”

The Capital Command Troops, equipped with superior arms of the finest quality, ran around the streets and markets regardless of day or night. All the teahouses and wine taverns where rumors were the most prevalent were closed down. Anyone who gathered in groups was arrested and imprisoned for slander and libel. In no time, everyone was thrown into a state of alarm. The sound of stringed and woodwind instruments, as well as reed pipes, no longer permeated the most prosperous Donglong Street.

“The ascension of the emperor is neither backed by the imperial genealogy records<sup>122</sup> nor authenticated in writing in cinnabar.”<sup>123</sup> Gao Zhongxiong stepped on a rock and lifted the article high. The sun was blistering hot, and his face was all drenched in sweat. “It’s hard to believe based on Xue Xiuzhuo’s words alone! If she is truly Prince Qin’s legitimate descendent of lawful birth, then may I ask, where is the cinnabar seal? Prince Qin is without an heir; if he has a daughter of lawful birth, how could he have allowed her to end up wandering among the common people?”

“Ever since the Great Imperial Ancestor<sup>124</sup> ascended to the throne, Dazhou has had twenty-one sovereigns, and there has never been an emperor with such dubious origins in hundreds of years! Is the one everyone kneels to today a sovereign of the Li clan, or a powerful minister of the Xue clan?!” Gao Zhongxiong wiped his sweat, his tone somber, “Court politics were undermined during the reign of Yongyi, its army was defeated during the reign of Xiande. The Li clan is held captive by the noble clans. They no longer have any grace to extend. They can’t even fend for themselves!”

An urgent flurry of footsteps sounded in the office compound, while the candlelight in Mingli Hall burned through the night without end.

“The express dispatch station reported back that the Prince of Donglie meant to send troops.” The mobilization of soldiers and horses was no small matter. Chen Zhen had already been here for four days; he even had his meals and slept here. “But there is no military report as to the exact timing for departure and arrival. We have no idea too.”

“The grains were all put together in haste. We can’t wait, and we can’t let it drag on. Issue a tally of urgency. If Qi Zhuyin doesn’t get into motion, then issue it to Qi Shiyu!” Kong Qiu sat in seat, so anxious was he that he was fuming. “If we can make it a quick battle in Dengzhou, the Beiyuan military drill grounds will definitely withdraw troops and turn back to provide reinforcements. Shao Chengbi will then be able to go into battle and follow up with an attack. But the imperial court has over ten writers, and yet Gao Zhongxiong still managed to get the upper hand. Is there no one in the Hanlin Academy and Imperial College?!”

The Grand Secretary was in a rage, and the hall fell silent for a moment. All the officials standing under the eaves with their hands by their sides kept their mouths shut.

Li Jianting’s birth origin was dubious to begin with. At first, it was said that she was Prince Qin’s legitimate daughter, but even so, she ought to have a genealogy record, or if not, at least Prince Qin’s last words in writing or cinnabar seal. When Xue Xiuzhuo verified the identity of the Heir Apparent, the proof he had produced was in the handwriting of Emperor Tianchen, Li Jianheng. The bright yellow<sup>125</sup> satin-covered folded book was indeed affixed with the imperial seal, but at that time, Li Jianheng was already dead, and the long-time officials from the Grand Secretariat all knew nothing of the matter.

And now, Zhongbo was insisting that Li Jianting was definitely not of the Li clan’s bloodline. Although the various regions strictly prohibited private discussions of state affairs, the rumors persisted. Even worse, there were also speculations about the female emperor and Xue Xiuzhuo.

“This battle is a tough one to fight,” Cen Yu said. “It’d be far better to go give the Prince of Donglie another nudge.”

Shao Chengbi bumpily hobbled his way up the city wall. He could not see Cizhou from here, only the continuous stretch of the Dunzhou garrison troops’ military tents. Tantai Hu had complied with Shen Zechuan’s order and was approaching Dancheng amidst both parties’ increasingly heated cussing.

“Tantai Hu was originally Xiao Chiye’s general, but was later transferred by Xiao Chiye to Zhongbo, where he began to guard Dunzhou. That Shen Zechuan could successfully defend Duanzhou was, in part, thanks to Tantai Hu.” The official following beside Shao Chengbi’s side was the same official who went to Qidong to deliver the tally of urgency. He was the son of a former subordinate of Shao Chengbi. His name was Xu

Yu. After the Shao clan had their properties sealed off and family members executed, he was dismissed from his military rank. He stayed in the relay station where he eked a living in a sinecure. He knew the generals from the various regions like the back of his hand.

Shao Chengbi shifted his crippled leg and moved closer to the battlements. "What is this person's relationship to Tantai Long?"

"He's Tantai Long's younger brother."

"Tantai Long is steady and reliable. If he takes after his elder brother's nature," Shao Chengbi looked at the boundless horizon where dusk was creeping up on, "then he probably won't make a rash move."

"Shen Zechuan won over the six prefectures by playing the benevolence and righteousness card," Xu Yu said, "and now he is taking the stand that 'the Li clan is malevolent', and 'the Prefectural Lord has just cause', so naturally, he would not dare to let Tantai Hu attack the city, lest he gives the others grounds for gossip. However, the way this humble official sees it, the Dunzhou garrison troops intend to encircle and block off the city gates to deplete Dancheng's granary in an attempt to force Viceroy Shao to open the gates."

"The treasury is empty, and the army is short on military grains. Besieging the city to force a surrender is indeed an excellent strategy." Shao Chengbi walked along the battlements. "How is Tantai Hu's management of his troops?"

Xu Yu looked out of the city and thought for a moment. "Relaxed and free handed," He answered.

Tantai Hu ate his meal in the camp. Ever since he had arrived at the Beiyuan military drill grounds, Yu Xiaozai had been eating and staying with him.

It was already dark now.

"Anything unusual during the night patrol?" Tantai Hu asked.

Liu Kong, who was standing at the entrance of the tent, answered, "All is well. General, that Shao Chengbi was so scared on hearing of your mighty name that he doesn't even dare to step out of the city gates."

"I heard Shao Chengbi is a cripple." Tantai Hu cleaned out his meal in several mouthfuls. "I wonder if he dares to fight on horseback with us."

"They want to defend the city." With Yu Xiaozai present, Liu Kong watched his words and merely said, "If there are any orders from His Lordship, I'll immediately report it to you, so please take a rest, General."

The camp was buzzing with mosquitoes, so the tent flap was lowered. Yu Xiaozai soaked his feet in hot water and asked Tantai Hu in a quiet voice, "I can see that this person is quick-witted and bright. How come I didn't see him on my last tour on inspection?"

"I hadn't promoted him yet at that time," Tantai Hu said. "He has had a hard life. He comes from a farming household in Dengzhou. During the fourth year of Xiande, his family was slaughtered by the Biansha Cavalry, and he mixed in with the Fanzhou bandits for a period of time. Later, he joined my troops. I guess he can be said to have turned over a new leaf."

Meticulous as always, Yu Xiaozai thought about matters as he wiped his feet.

At night, they slept on separate beds. Tantai Hu's snores were deafening, but unexpectedly, when the hour of chou came around, his stomach started acting up. Tantai Hu initially thought that the food was unclean. He was in such pain that his face had turned white. It was only until the latter half of the night that he felt something amiss.

Outside the tent, Liu Kong reported with urgency, "General! The brothers are all having the runs!"

Clutching his stomach, Tantai Hu slipped on his shoes and lifted the tent flap to hear moans everywhere around the camp. The latrines were all crowded full of people. His expression grew slightly grim as he said, "Summon the military medics first, then send someone to convey the news immediately to Cizhou!"

Yu Xiaozai was half-dead sleeping, but he crawled up from bed on hearing the commotion. As he draped his clothes over him, he walked out and exclaimed in shock, "What's happening?!"

"Someone poisoned—"

Before Liu Kong could finish his words, the sound of vomiting rang out from the sides as all the soldiers began to throw up. With such similar symptoms, what else could it be if not a case of poisoning? Tantai Hu's heart skipped in alarm as he realized that there was a spy among the soldiers.

"Summon the military medics, quick!" Tantai Hu commanded with urgency.

Xu Yu was already asleep when he heard the scout reporting back. He did not even have the time to wash up when he went to summon Shao Chengbi. As he led Shao Chengbi up the city gate, he said, “Viceroy Shao, the garrison troops are in chaos!”

Shao Chengbi looked at the bright lights in the far distance and heard human voices.

Xu Yu was delighted. “The scout reported back that everyone from top to bottom in the garrison troops ate something bad and are now suffering from stomach upsets, with bouts of vomiting and diarrhea. That Tantai Hu is now burning with anxiety, like an ant on a hot pan.”

Being prudent, Shao Chengbi said, “Is it true? If it’s a trap to lure the enemies, there may still be an ambush.”

“Tantai Hu has the runs too. Everyone in the campground is down for the count. It doesn’t seem to be fake. Besides, Zhongbo has no reinforcements. He would never use 20,000 garrison troops to put on a show.” Xu Yu held his blade in his hand, feeling a surge of emotions in a rare moment. “Viceroy Shao, once we emerge victorious in this battle and return home in triumph, the injustices we suffered will be redressed!”

Shao Chengbi’s breathing was slightly heavy. He braced himself against the battlements, still hesitating. The junior soldier at the bottom hurried up the steps and cupped his fists at Shao Chengbi. “Viceroy Shao, the express dispatch station’s tally of urgency—the Prince of Donglie has mobilized troops!”

Shao Chengbi narrowed one of his eyes and tilted his head back to roar with laughter under the firelight. He suddenly turned back and said, “Heaven is helping me! Lead the horse over!”

Tantai Hu was down with a bad case of vomiting and diarrhea too. His stomach was churning, and his legs were trembling. There were not enough military medics to go around. The erected shack was packed full of soldiers lying down. Even Liu Kong had puked a few times.

“Is the message sent?” Tantai Hu asked with a ghastly pale face.

Yu Xiaozai smacked his thigh. “How’d I know?!”

At this moment, it was tough to even form a squad that could still stand on their feet, let alone lined up in formation. Tantai Hu extinguished half of the torches in the camp to put on a show of normalcy, but his eyelids suddenly twitched, and he kept having the nagging feeling that something was going to happen tonight.

Liu Kong said to Tantai Hu, "The ones transporting military grains are all our own men, so nothing will go awry on the way. We have been eating rice and noodles for a month without incident, but something just had to go wrong tonight of all times..."

Tantai Hu said through gritted teeth, "There has to be a spy from Qudu among the troops."

Although Yu Xiaozai tried his best to divert the topic, he was the only one in the entire camp who was still fine. Cold sweat broke out on his back. It had already occurred to him what the other party's intent was. The gears whirled in his mind. His expression unchanging, he said, "Let's not lose our heads now. If by any chance—"

He had yet to finish speaking when he heard the sound of hooves from the western side of the camp galloping their way over. The soldiers on the watchtower struck the drum to sound the alarm. In an instant, the words "enemy attack!" reverberated through the entire camp.

Liu Kong let loose an exclamation and cried out in a fluster, "General!"

Tantai Hu abruptly jerked to his feet, his chest heaving. Then he yanked up the soldiers who were in slightly better condition and shouted, "Get into formation!"

The Capital Command Troops had light cavalry as their vanguards, so they could launch a surprise attack and gather intelligence on the facts of the matter. If the Dunzhou Garrison troops were indeed laying a trap to lure the enemies in, they would be able to retreat immediately.

The light cavalry of the Capital Command Troops charged their way to the western side. The drum on the watchtower was pounded with such intensity it was about to break. Tantai Hu raised his arm and hollered, "Archers!"

The Dunzhou garrison troops often had to face off the Biansha Cavalry, and in order to deal with the Biansha Cavalry, Tantai Hu had the bows the troops used swapped from longbows to the strong bows used by the Libei Armored Cavalry. The results had been remarkable the few times they were used in battles, but right now, soldiers who could still draw a bow were few and far between.

The bows and arrows failed to wear down the light cavalry. The other party already knew of the fatigue and frailness of the Dunzhou garrison troops. The infantrymen behind charged swiftly with shields in hands, their armors glinting in the moonlight. These were the finest gears of the Eight Great Training Divisions.

The campground's wooden fences were knocked down. Even if the garrison troops were to run now, it was too late. Tantai Hu drew his blade to face the enemies head-on, but before he could get to the infantry of the Capital Command Troops, the light cavalry rushed right into his sight. He caught a whiff of gunpowder, and his heart went cold as he rolled to the ground.

The bronze firearms instantly blasted into action, sending sparks flying in all directions.

Tantai Hu covered his head and dodged, but both his arms were stinging in searing pain. He turned his arms over and gasped in alarm.

“By grace of imperial magnanimity, the imperial court will not pursue the heinous crimes of all those willing to surrender tonight.” Shao Chengbi spurred his horse into the camp. “The 300,000-strong Qidong garrison troops have already made it past Tianfei Watchtower. The Shen clan’s rebellion has failed to come to fruition and is now at a dead end. This old man advises all in attendance to wise up and surrender before it’s too late!”

Credits: Thank you Gale for spotting the typo! <3

◇ CHAPTER 270: DOORSTEP ◇

Tantai Hu understood that victory would prove hard for this battle. He spat a mouthful of saliva and cursed, “Son of a bitch, wily old fox. To think you would use such an underhanded trick!”

Unmoved by the cussing, Shao Chengbi looked at Tantai Hu and continued, “By following you into battle, the soldiers are entrusting their lives to you. You have no chance of victory now. In resisting stubbornly, you are disregarding the safety of the soldiers. Tantai Hu, this old one is a former acquaintance of your eldest brother, so let me advise you again to surrender and pledge allegiances to the side of the righteous.”

“Bullocks.” Tantai Hu said coldly as he rose with his blade. “I followed His Lordship on a campaign to fight against the Biansha Cavalry, and yet you want me to surrender to you at the end of the day. Bah! I, Tantai Hu, will not bow!”

The words had yet to be fully out of his mouth when Xu Yu heard the “whoosh” of an arrow being released from the top of the watchtower. The whistling sound pierced through the darkness of the night, sounding particularly jarring on the ears. Xu Yu, having long heard about the smooth passage of the Zhongbo bridleway and great numbers of relay stations, guessed that Tantai Hu was passing on the news with this one move.

Xu Yu immediately advised, “Viceroy Shao, there is no time to lose. Let’s make this a quick battle and get it over and done with!”

“We treat you with compassion even though you insist on resorting to arms.” Shao Chengbi gripped the hilt of his broadsword. “To catch the bandits, first capture their chief. Kill Tantai Hu, and we will be able to score a victory without fighting tonight.”

The Capital Command Troops had already swarmed in at the drop of his voice. The garrison troops were too powerless to resist and could only cut a wretched sight as they fled. Yu Xiaozai saw that Tantai Hu was in no position to do a thing without support. Just as he was about to be surrounded, a few partridge cries suddenly rang out from outside the camp.

Partridges?

Where on earth were there partridges in Zhongbo?

Right at that time, in the very instant Shao Chengbi drew out his new broadsword, Yu Xiaozai covered his head and shouted, “Laohu, roll!”

Tantai Hu originally did not want to roll, but at the very moment he was about to lunge forward, he felt a pain in the back of his knee and his entire body went down with a “thud”, his face to the ground. Before he could steady himself, he heard the military tent at the side collapse with a thunderous boom, smashing right into the Capital Command Troops in front.

The catapult!

Tantai Hu subconsciously thought it was the Biansha Cavalry, but then he thought the better of it and exclaimed with an overjoyed expression, “The Imperial Army!”

With the light from the flames, Xu Yu saw soldiers surging out from the eastern side of the camp and could not help but curse “shit” to himself. The firelight outside the camp suddenly intensified. The Imperial Army had even brought along the catapult from the Cizhou armory. They had been waiting for a long time just to seize the opportunity to fight the Capital Command Troops tonight.

In the twinkling of an eye, the tables had turned. Shao Chengbi wanted to withdraw his troops, but the retreat route in the back had already been intercepted and severed.

“Viceroy Shao,” Xu Yu said to Shao Chengbi, “We have played into their hands!”

The collapsed military tent knocked over the torches, and sparks abruptly shot up. The Capital Command Troops’ light cavalry were only a few hundred in number. As they hastily retreated, they bumped into the Imperial Army that had come circling around to their backs.

Tantai Hu looked as if he had seen his dear mother the instant he saw the Imperial Army. He propped himself up and rose to his feet, crying out with joy, "Bloody hell, Qiao Tianya!"

On hearing this name, Shao Chengbi looked back in the firelight. A few strands of white hair from his slightly loosened bun fell, blocking the sight of his blinded eye. His vaguely hunched back was not at all strapping tall, but it looked like a steep, protruding hill in the color of the night.

"Uncle Shao." Qiao Tianya's blade-gripping hand slid down, where it rested on the hilt of a sword that was not easily drawn. After a moment's pause, he continued, "—Shifu."

The past materialized in that very instant, but in just a split second, it dissolved away into the long, endless night. Qiao Tianya was at the age of four when he acknowledged Shao Chengbi as his master. This sword that he had brought along when he left Qudu had also been a gift from Shao Chengbi.

Shao Chengbi did not have a sword. He slowly drew out that brand new broadsword of his and looked at Qiao Tianya as he proclaimed in a hoarse voice, "Traitors ought to be executed."

Huo Lingyun galloped through the starry wilderness, speeding through the lush expanse of grass as he rushed in the direction of Dengzhou. At the foot of the city wall, he raised his authority token high and bellowed, "Open the gates!"

The Dengzhou overhanging gate slammed down with a thunderous bang, and Huo Lingyun galloped across the passageway, dismounted his horse, and sprinted up the city wall. He grabbed over the torch at the side and thrust it before him to illuminate the way ahead, gasping heavily for breath as he drove away the darkness. The Tianfei Watchtower mountain chain was still and silent in the pitch-dark night; the Qidong Garrison Troops mentioned in the urgent report were nowhere to be seen.

Huo Lingyun asked the general guarding the city, "Any activity from the smoke signal towers?"<sup>126</sup>

"All as usual," The general guarding the city answered.

Huo Lingyun's back was all soaked from speeding the way over. He wiped the sweat off his face with a palm and returned the torch to the general guarding the city.

"Be on your guard," he commanded.

Dark clouds hid the moon from view, and the stars faded away. All good things were gone in a flash, fleeting and ephemeral. Sparks flew all over as broadsword and sword collided. The victor was decided at the moment when Shao Chengbi fell off his horse.

His broadsword was broken, as were his master-disciple ties with Qiao Tianya.

The camp was illuminated by the collapsed and pinned-down torches. The footsteps of the Capital Command Troops were in disarray. They were no match for the Imperial Army, who were masters at combat on foot.

Shao Chengbi, too, was no match for Qiao Tianya.

Qiao Tianya was only a few steps away from Shao Chengbi. His sword returned to its sheath under the firelight, and a disarray of overlapping shadows shrouded the side of his body. In his trance, he actually bore some resemblance to the Shao Chengbi who drew his broadsword earlier.

“Defeat is certain this battle,” Qiao Tianya said softly under the crackling sound of the fire. “Shifu is not here to crush me.”

With his hand covering his chest, Shao Chengbi struggled to gasp for his dying breath. His pale lips opened and closed. “I’m already at this age... I’m no longer as valiant as I was in those days... I came to see you... Your father erred...” Shao Chengbi tried his best to open his eyes wide as he gazed at the blurry canopy of heaven. “... And so have I... With this battle... I’ve repaid the debt... on your father’s behalf... Shen... truly lives up to the Grand Mentor’s... words...”

Qiao Tianya looked at Shao Chengbi.

But Shao Chengbi would not look at Qiao Tianya. His hoarse voice was just like a drum that had been broken. In the last lingering moments of his life, he murmured, “Qiao Songyue. A fine lad.”

Qiao Tianya tightened his grip on the hilt of the sword. He stood unmoving and still in the entire sky of flying ashes and let the dust settle upon him, his shoulders cutting a sorry sight. The day he went to the Shao’s residence to acknowledge Shao Chengbi as his master, Shao Chengbi had patted the top of his head and said the exact words, “Qiao Songyue. A fine lad.”

Tantai Hu, who was on the other end dragging the bodies, whistled at Qiao Tianya and tossed over the firearms they had just seized.

“Other than the dozen or so equipped by the light cavalry,” Tantai Hu’s expression was odd, “the others are all malfunctioning.”

Qi Zhuyin stood before the Tianfei Watchtower’s beacon tower and overlooked the winding mountain range. This night was just like a rising tide, trapping not only her but also Qidong. She had stood here alone countless of times before, watching over the Five Commanderies.

Seeing her lonely back, Qi Wei could not stop himself from calling out, “Commander-in-chief...”

At this call, Qi Zhuyin thought of her conversation with Hua Xiangyi before she set off.

Hua Xiangyi sat upright opposite her, the white flower at her temple hidden among hair the color of raven black, as if floating open on the crystal clear water surface. It was not as conspicuous as the lady herself, but it gave her a boost of charm. As she brewed the tea, she said, “Looks like success or failure hinges on this one move, given how Qudu is pressing you so urgently.”

Qi Zhuyin watched her steep tea, her womanly, dainty hands holding up the clay teapot. Strangely enough, as long as Hua Xiangyi was there, all the strife outside seemed to have vanished. Hua Xiangyi could always quite manage to make Qi Zhuyin think of the pleasure of rouge.

“I saw that your entire army is ready to depart, so I thought of having another cup of tea with you.”

“Tea to send me off?” Qi Zhuyin asked.

As boiling water poured over the tea leaves, wisps of steam spiraled into the air.

“Tea to make you stay,” Hua Xiangyi said.

The tension in the atmosphere turned up a notch. Qi Zhuyin braced herself by the side of her knees, looking as if she was going to get up.

“By mobilizing troops, Commander-in-chief Qi means to obstruct Shen Zechuan from advancing west so that he will stay put in Zhongbo and not enter conflict with the Li clan. But if you ask me, Commander-in-chief Qi is merely deceiving yourself with this one move, much like the thief who plugs his ears when stealing a bell. Not only is it of no benefit to the common people,” Hua Xiangyi nudged the tea gently over to the other end of the small table and looked at Qi Zhuyin, “it also deviates from Commander-in-chief Qi’s original intent.”

Qi Zhuyin stopped mid-action.

The emerald window gauze reflecting the banana leaves blocked out some of the sunlight, making Hua Xiangyi look like she was sitting in a painting.

She said to Qi Zhuyin, "Food is scarce in Qudu, and the eight cities' granaries are empty. You were unwilling to follow Xiao Chiye eastward because deploying troops into war would make it hard for the common people, but how is your aid towards the Li clan now any different from sending troops?"

"The cage of the noble clans is already broken. Qudu is now at the time when they are filtering out all that is inferior and worthless." Qi Zhuyin decided to speak frankly. "Dazhou still has the opportunity to turn things around. But once Shen Zechuan's troops enter Qudu, this opportunity will be forfeited."

"I know best the eight cities' accounts," Hua Xiangyi said. "The opportunity Commander-in-chief Qi speaks of is not an opportunity for Dazhou or the common people in the world, but merely for the emperor."

Qi Zhuyin was slightly taken aback.

"The legitimate lineage of the Li clan's bloodline has long since been severed with Li Jianheng. I do not recognize who the one sitting on the imperial court right now is. When my aunt was still alive, she often said Li Jianting bears a striking resemblance to Emperor Guangcheng, but Xue Xiuzhuo insisted that she is Prince Qin's daughter.<sup>127</sup> There is one thing mentioned in Zhongbo's diatribe that is true. If this woman is really a legitimate descendant of Prince Qin, then why doesn't Xue Xiuzhuo produce the precious proof from Prince Qin? Since he is so certain, why not show the proof to convince the entire world too?"

When Emperor Xiande was still on the throne, he addressed Hua Xiangyi as "san-meimei", or "Third Younger Sister". Everything she used was purchased in accordance with protocols meant for a princess. Even Li Jianheng had to respectfully address her as "jiejie", or "Elder Sister". Li Jianting ought to have called her "gugu", the address for a paternal aunt. If there was anyone else in the world who could verify Li Jianting's identity now that the empress dowager was dead, it was Hua Xiangyi.

Hua Xiangyi continued in a soft voice, "If the female emperor lacks legitimacy, then how can Commander-in-chief deem herself loyal?"

Qi Zhuyin clenched the teacup. Ripples began to form on the surface of the tea. “If she can achieve peace and stability for the common people, then my helping her is loyalty.”

“If that’s the case, Commander-in-chief Qi might as well assist Shen Zechuan rather than Li Jianting.” Hua Xiangyi finally showed her mettle amid her gentle words. However, she swapped back her address of Qi Zhuyin. “A-Yin, you and Xiao Jiming are friends who have been through adversity together, and you and Lu Guangbai are former superior and subordinate. If you assist Li Jianting, these two men will have to draw their blades against you, and you, them. This is the first reason.

“Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye jointly administer military and political affairs in the northeast. Shen Zechuan’s withdrawal of troops when you attack Dengzhou is a minor matter, but Xiao Chiye’s military defeat is a major issue. A military expedition afar is arduous. Without Shen Zechuan, the 90,000-strong Armored Cavalry will undoubtedly be defeated. Should the Biansha Cavalry stage a comeback at the time, the common people in the three regions to the east would still have to face this menace. Your loyalty today is to make the expectant common people in the three regions suffer again. This is the second reason.

“Li Jianting conferred the noble title of ‘Prince of Donglie’ on you not out of gratitude, but because she was forced by the situation. It is often said that water brims only to overflow, the moon waxes only to wane.<sup>128</sup> Let’s say you really quell the rebellion in Zhongbo. Once Qudu settles down, Qidong will be crowned with illustrious military service, but there will be no Libei to mutually hold Qidong in check. Since she can make you a prince today owing to the situation, then she can also be forced by circumstances someday to strip you of your conferred title.<sup>129</sup> This is the third reason.

“Yao Wenyu serves under Shen Zechuan’s command, and with his eloquence, spurred all the talents in the world into swarming over to Zhongbo. Shen Zechuan not only entrusted heavy responsibilities to the former Qudu minister, Yu Xiaozai, but also promoted the former advisor of the enemy’s forces, Gao Zhongxiong. He does not let family status and past history prejudice him as he leads the advisors under this command to push ahead with the census registry. In just one year, he has already rooted out the bandits in Zhongbo and created the world’s grains hub. Given how he has acted with magnanimity in Zhongbo thus far, he will similarly be able to accommodate the competent ministers on the imperial court when his troops enter Qudu. This is the fourth reason.”

Hua Xiangyi gently held up the white flower at her temple and said slowly, “Everything of the above that Li Jianting can do, so can Shen Zechuan, but all that Shen Zechuan can do, Li Jianting might not necessarily be able to.”

These four admonitions made complete sense, whether for personal or public reasons. Like a slap to the head,<sup>130</sup> it shattered Qi Zhuyin’s loyalty to pieces.

However, this was still not enough.

Hua Xiangyi’s slender fingers that were holding the flower formed a contrast with the eastern pearl on her ear. She still looked wan and sallow, her expression several shades downcast. She spoke slowly and unhurriedly, “A-Yin, the Secretariat Elder once said that ‘men who wield brushes die in remonstrations, while men who wield swords die in battles’, but look, in these twenty years of political storms, how many of them are able to die worthy deaths?

“Han Cheng wanted to support a boy of his own clan into becoming the emperor, but the world wouldn’t let him, not out of loyalty to the Li clan, but because the Han clan was immoral and was thus unworthy of the throne. Dazhou’s internal and external strifes are endless, and the one who can truly end this all has long since ceased to be Li Jianting. Shen Zechuan improves the lives of the people so that they thrive. He has just cause, and he has the respect and support of the people—he is the hope of all in the world.” She slowly raised her eyes to gaze at Qi Zhuyin, as if she was gazing at the stabilizing force<sup>131</sup> that would determine the rise and fall of the empire. Her gaze held both admiration and heartache. “And now, the lives and deaths of the people all lie in this one decision of yours.”

The thick mist from the tea dispersed among the window lattice.

After contemplating it for a long time, Qi Zhuyin asked Qi Wei, “A hundred years later, will anyone still remember Qi Zhuyin?”

“They will.” Qi Wei suddenly choked up with emotions. “With this move, the Commander-in-chief will fulfill the wishes of all in the world. From now on, the people will live in peace, and the great cause will be accomplished... Who wouldn’t remember Qi Zhuyin?”

“My name cannot be recorded into history, and my memorial tablet cannot be served with offerings. This is also a violation of the Qi clan’s ancestral teachings. I am, in truth, a traitor of Dazhou.” Qi Zhuyin gazed at the landscape. “After my passing, I will be a pile of yellow earth, a handful of sodden mud.”

With his hand on his blade, Qi Wei kneeled and said, “If Commander-in-chief Qi passes and I am still alive, I will lay offerings before the Commander-in-chief’s memorial tablet. If I’m not, then my sons, grandsons, and generations after generations of my family shall light that everlasting altar lamp<sup>132</sup> for the Commander-in-chief.”

Qi Zhuyin looked back and smiled, “In that case, it’s all worth it.”

The city of Dancheng was close to Qudu. All the imperial court officials in the capital city were on tenterhooks. Mingli Hall was brightly illuminated, and the side hall was full of people. The moment the military report came in, everyone listened carefully with rapt attention.

“What is the update on the battle?” Li Jianting asked.

“To reply Your Majesty,” the back of the military officer kneeling before the door was all drenched in sweat as he gasped heavily for breath, “the 20,000 Capital Command Troops fell for the rebel troops’ trap, and Viceroy Shao was caught in a heavy siege—”

“How about the Prince of Donglie?” Kong Qiu stood up.

The military officer wiped his sweat and answered, “The news of the Prince of Donglie’s mobilization of troops is actually faked. Qidong’s 300,000-strong Garrison Troops have not moved at all!”

The teacup in Cen Yu’s hand clattered to the ground. A sudden uproar broke out in the side hall. All the eunuchs and palace maids present were thrown into a panic.

“What about the remaining Capital Command Troops?” Xue Xiuzhuo asked.

“Transfer them back immediately!” Chen Zhen reacted swiftly and strode a step out to say in an urgent tone, “Transfer the remaining Capital Command Troops back to Qudu immediately!”

“Hold on,” Xue Xiuzhuo suddenly spoke up. He looked at the military officer and said in a low voice, “When the Capital Command Troops are being transferred back, issue the tally of urgency to Juexi, Hezhou, and Huaizhou. Say that the rise and fall of the nation all hinges on this moment. Whoever can deploy troops to aid Qudu, the imperial court will reward them with a million taels!”

One million taels—with such a heavy reward, there were bound to be brave men stepping forward.

Xue Xiuzhuo was already forced to a dead end. The riot in Huaizhou had yet to stop, and there were still leftover bandits in Hezhou. With this move, he was dangling the key to the Xi clan's money vault at the city gates of Qudu—Shen Zechuan was not invincible without the assistance of the Libei Armored Cavalry. Whoever could tilt the scale in their favor at this moment would become the next power of Dazhou!

Credit: Thank you to Katie82 for the clarification! <3

◇ CHAPTER 271: HUILIAN ◇

“Qi Zhuyin has really turned traitor?” Cen Yu was in disbelief. “The Qi clan has guarded Qidong for a century. With this move, she’s destroying Qidong’s hundred years of prestigious reputation overnight...”

Dazhou was surnamed Li. They could remonstrate with their sovereign and die for their sovereign, but they could acknowledge no one else other than the Li clan as their sovereign. Hua Xiangyi said that the people did not want the descendant from the Han clan because of the Han clan’s immorality. That was a pretext. The ministers who really stood in the imperial court were all ministers of the Li clan. Without the Li clan, they would all be officials of a former dynasty.

If the emperor was bad, he could be changed, but he had to be surnamed Li—This was legitimacy. Otherwise, why would Hai Liangyi remonstrate with his death? Why would Xue Xiuzhuo do his utmost to such an extent? Wouldn’t it be better for them to switch allegiances to another master and declare Libei king? Centuries of the so-called “loyalty” all rested on this one surname. Overstep that boundary, and they would be treacherous traitors and despicable scums who violated the ethics of social order.<sup>133</sup> So they ran around shouting with arms raised, doing all they could. What they wanted was a resurgence of the Li clan’s Dazhou, not to kneel to another master.

Gao Zhongxiong rose to fame, but even when Qudu read his articles, they still spat on him and cursed him. This was because he was a turncoat.<sup>134</sup> To betray his original master was to be disloyal. A minister stood by loyalty. If he could not even stay loyal to his master, what kind of an official was he? He was merely a beast in human clothing!

Yao Wenyu was renowned all over the world for his talents, and yet the virtuous talents he sought for Shen Zechuan were mostly recluses from the countryside; those that came from Qudu were few and far between. When the Imperial College discussed him, they lamented him for being a talent led astray and cursed him for turning his back on his former teacher's legacy. Hai Liangyi remonstrated to his death to protect the legitimacy of the throne, and yet he went to serve Shen Zechuan whose origins lack integrity. He threw in his lot with a traitor, and for that, he had long been disdained by these Confucian scholars at the core of the Dazhou empire. He was no longer that unimpeachable "unpolished jade" of yesteryear.

Tears coursed down Kong Qiu's face at the way things were now. He sighed, "It is I who have misjudged Qi Zhuyin!"

"Why was Shao Chengbi so easily defeated?" Chen Zhen collapsed into his chair. "He even took away the firearms from the Chunquan Battalion..."

Shen Zechuan ascended the stairs. Dawn had yet to break, and mist was rolling at the campground they were originally stationed. He could already get a clear look at Dancheng.

"It's getting cold." Fei Sheng followed behind him, holding the overcoat for Shen Zechuan. "Master, watch out for the chills."

Thin frost condensed among the mud. Qiao Tianya, Tantai Hu, and the few of them crossed over with their blades in tow as they followed the Prefectural Lord up. Tantai Hu had just made another trip to the lavatory, and his face was ghastly pale as he kneeled to pay his obeisances to Shen Zechuan. After greeting "Your Lordship", he consciously felt ashamed.

"You did well beating them at their own game," Shen Zechuan looked askance at him. "Once Second Master is back, you'll be rewarded."

Tantai Hu's face flushed red. "This... This is because of Your Lordship's thorough planning... I fucking... didn't expect a spy among the troops." He did not want credit that was not his to begin with. Pointing at Yu Xiaozai at the side, he continued, "It's all thanks to Youjing for being quick-witted!"

"Then you might as well thank Ding Tao," Yu Xiaozai teased. "He was the one who struck the back of your knees and sent you sprawling for cover.”

At other times, Qiao Tianya would have said something to poke fun at him, but today, he looked depressed as he stood by the side and said nothing.

“How did Your Lordship guess that there was a spy among the troops?” Tantai Hu inquired.

“Weren’t you the one who told me that?” Shen Zechuan asked him in reply. He was in a good mood today. “You set off for Duanzhou when you heard that Wang Xian had arrived at Duanzhou. How would you have the guts to do so in the past? Not unless there was someone else instigating you.”

Tantai Hu admired Xiao Chiye the most, and he feared Xiao Chiye the most too. Although he was headstrong and obstinate, he wholeheartedly yielded to Second Master. If there was no one dropping hints in his ears, then given his frank and blunt nature alone, the thought that Wang Xian would lodge a complaint against him would never have occurred to him.

“The only question is whether this spy,” Yu Xiaozai said, “is a spy from Qudu or Biansha.”

“I wasn’t sure at first,” Fei Sheng said. “But from what he did last night, he is clearly a spy from Qudu.”

“No,” Qiao Tianya suddenly piped up. “The spy hiding among the troops is definitely not sent by Qudu.” The rest turned back to look at Qiao Tianya, who continued, “If he was sent by Qudu, the Capital Command Troops would not have been completely in the dark... Even Uncle Shao was unaware. Your Lordship, there’s something fishy about this matter. Second Master is in the midst of pressing in towards Amu’er. If Amu’er had arranged to plant a Scorpion here, he would definitely not use laxative, but lethal poison. That way, the garrison troops will be no match for the Capital Command Troops. Once Cizhou is in danger, Second Master will withdraw his troops and return to provide reinforcement. Only then will Amu’er’s crisis be averted.”

Xiao Chiye had already arrived at Mosanchuan, where he was relying on the Huiyan Tribe to win over the three tribes to form a mutual frontier trade market alliance and prepare to attack Amu’er together. Amu’er’s vanguard, Huhelu, and chief general, Hasen, had all died in battle. At present, he was a trapped beast. If he wanted to break out of the encirclement, killing off the Dunzhou garrison troops would be the most convenient option.

Tantai Hu, being the artless person he was, said off-handedly, “Then who else can it be? It can’t be our own people in Zhongbo, can it?”

An innocuous remark on the speaker’s part, but not so on the listener’s end.

The gears turned in Yu Xiaozai’s mind, but he did not dare to continue from where Tantai Hu left off. Were someone to say that there were no factions in Zhongbo, they would be speaking of an impossibility. When Shen Zechuan was in Cizhou in the early days, the advisors under Zhou Gui’s command clashed for this exact reason. To date, officials who held key positions in Zhongbo belonged to one of two categories. The first was local officials in Zhongbo Shen Zechuan promoted, and the second was former ministers of Dazhou who came to throw in their lots with Shen Zechuan. Although they sat on equal footing with the officials from the six prefectures, everyone’s interpersonal relationships in private differed, as were their purposes for serving the Prefectural Lord. Between them, a boundary line existed.

Yu Xiaozai studied under Cen Yu, who was a major official of the Grand Secretariat. He came to Zhongbo to meditate for peace, but in the end, he did not leave owing to his own selfish desire to follow and serve the Prefectural Lord. Shen Zechuan treated him well and entrusted him with the heavy responsibility of conducting inspection tours. He traveled around the six prefectures to supervise and inspect the government administration, and it was inevitable for him to have friction with others. However, this had not deteriorated to the point where they mutually fought each other, because he did not manage the government affairs of a prefecture, had no soldiers in his command, and reported directly to Shen Zechuan. Shen Zechuan could dismiss him at any time he so wished. The one who really upset the balance was Wang Xian. Wang Xian was a criminal official who was relegated out of the capital, yet he still had direct jurisdiction over the key economic affairs of the six prefectures—he really gave Luo Mu hell when he was in Chazhou.

“Speaking of the spy,” Shen Zechuan asked Tantai Hu, “has he been caught yet?”

“The troops were in disarray last night.” Tantai Hu looked back at the squad in the distance. “We still aren’t done with the count yet... Your Lordship, the firearms we seized this time are all malfunctioning.”

Shen Zechuan had only just learned of this matter. With a slight frown on his face, he asked, “Malfunctioning?”

Qiao Tianya eased over to Shen Zechuan and reminded him under his breath, “That batch of firearms from King Yi of Fanzhou. There are a total of one hundred and thirty-five.”

Of Dazhou’s Eight Great Training Divisions, only the Chunquan Battalion was equipped with firearms. Back then, when Xiao Chiye wanted it, it was only by virtue of his relationship with Li Jianheng that he could get his hands on them to fiddle with. Firearms were restricted by the Ministry of War, and even the Ministry of Works did not have its blueprint, so it was very difficult for one to get leaked out. Shen Zechuan did not manage to get his hands on one either when he was in the Imperial Bodyguards. The number of firearms was scarce; excluding the damaged ones in the armory, there were less than two hundred in total.

Shen Zechuan said in a quiet voice, “Have you checked the serial numbers?”

Qiao Tianya nodded. “Uncle Shao brought along a hundred and fifty firearms. They have the same numbers as the ones Huo Lingyun handed in.”

No wonder they were malfunctioning. The real firearms had made their way into Shen Zechuan’s hands a long time ago.

Shen Zechuan was slightly stunned. Reacting swiftly, he said, “The Ministry of War had the firearms blueprint and the key to Chunquan Battalion’s armory stored away. If Chen Zhen was the one who swapped them out, he would not have handed them to Shao Chengbi, and Shao Chengbi would not have been able to deploy troops.” He looked at Qiao Tianya. In the blink of an eye, many thoughts occurred to him. “Shao Chengbi knew that this batch of firearms had been swapped, yet he insisted on sending his troops and coming over to send himself to his death, because —”

Opportunity!

If Shen Zechuan wanted to send his troops into Qudu, he needed to have an opportunity.

“The Grand Mentor wanted me to conceal myself among the Imperial Bodyguards to wait for Your Lordship.” Qiao Tianya’s eyes were pitch black. “In the indenture<sup>135</sup> he gave to Your Lordship, there was no mention of my surname or birthplace.”

Qi Huilian only wrote the word “Songyue”.

“In that case, other than me,” Qiao Tianya said calmly and steadily, “is there another ‘Fengquan’?”

Raindrops pitter-pattered down between Shen Zechuan’s brows, and the strong wind suddenly came sweeping over, wiping out the smoke in the camp. In the twinkling of an eye, a rainstorm came pouring down in torrents. Fei Sheng shook the overcoat open to shield Shen Zechuan from the rain.

“Should there come a day you and I both lose our lives in the midst of this, the arrangement today will be the killer move that will preserve his life.”

Qi Huilian hugged his legs as he sat under the eaves and watched the torrential rain pour. He set down the empty wine gourd and grinned at an oblivious Ji Gang beside him.

“You gifted him Yang Shan Xue. I’ll give him Shi Jun Dao—the Blade of Regicide.”

◇ CHAPTER 272: TWIST ◇

Raindrops pelted the military tent. Tea was boiling on the stove. Having already changed his clothes, Shen Zechuan sat in the chair and asked Ji Gang, “Does shifu know ‘Fengquan’?”

“Yes.” Ji Gang held the teacup in hand and glanced at Qiao Tianya at the side. “But I had no idea he’s Shao Chengbi’s son, much less knew that Shao Chengbi was selling steamed buns at the entrance of Zhaozui Temple... When the Grand Mentor said back then that he was going to do this, he only said that Fengquan was an informer.”

“Since he is Shao Chengbi’s son,” Shen Zechuan wondered, “how did he become Mu Ru’s younger brother?”

Ji Gang held the tea in his mouth before swallowing it a while later. “Do you still remember that night when we entered Zhaozui Temple, the Grand Mentor said that Eastern Palace suffered countless casualties, injured and dead, among its subordinates? It occurred to me at that time that since the Grand Mentor could feign insanity to survive, there must be several others from the Crown Prince’s faction who could have also slipped through the net to survive too. I asked the Grand Mentor later, but he wasn’t willing to speak of it, until one day, I chatted with the palace eunuch who came every month to deliver food and heard that Prince Chu, Li Jianheng, was fond of beauties and was racking his brains to scout for them in the local regions.”

Ji Gang told Qi Huilian about it as a joke, and several months later, Li Jianheng sent Mu Ru from the manor in the City of Jincheng to Qudu.

“I inquired with the Imperial Bodyguards. They said that Mu Ru was raised and trained in the manor since she was a child, and she barely even saw her younger brother once every five or six years. Fengquan was able to follow her into Qudu because their former family house was burned down, and he had nowhere to go except to seek refuge with his older sister.” Ji Gang set down the tea bowl and said with a serious expression. “I believed it to be true. You saw it too in Qudu. That Mu Ru really treated him as her younger brother. Who could tell that this was a sham?”

Before Li Jianheng could take Mu Ru into his residence upon her arrival in Qudu, Xiaofuzi seized the opportunity to offer her to Pan Rugui. Mu Ru was very much favored and pampered by Pan Rugui, and subsequently, Fengquan got into Pan Rugui’s good graces. However, he was still not Pan Rugui’s “grandson” at that time, because Pan Rugui still had a Xiaofuzi by his side.

“On the eve of the Dragon Boat Festival in the eighth year of the reign of Xiande, the Grand Mentor devised a plan to kill Xiaofuzi. You know of this incident too. I thought the Grand Mentor just wanted to get you out of the temple,” Ji Gang said, “but who would expect a Xiao Chiye to pop out midway through?”

When Shen Zechuan thought to this point, he suddenly remembered that not long after being released from Zhaozui Temple, when he was in the Imperial Bodyguards raising elephants, Xiao Chiye intercepted him to demand his thumb ring back, suspecting that he had planted a spy around Li Jianheng.

A natural-born talent.

That was how Qi Huilian praised Xiao Chiye. Because his sense of smell was too keen. With just his understanding of Li Jianheng alone, he sensed that someone was instigating Li Jianheng to fight for Mu Ru. However, Xiao Chiye also did not expect that Shen Zechuan was not at all the person who planted the person by Li Jianheng’s side. He pitted himself against Shen Zechuan, only to turn up for it empty-handed. Qi Huilian, however, had not exposed a single trace at all. This acuity of Xiao Chiye was simply astounding.

“After Fengquan was sent in,” Ji Gang said, “the Grand Mentor never mentioned him again.”

The sound of drumming rain on the roof of the tent slightly underscored the quietness in the interior of the tent.

Hunu was lying in Yao Wenyu's lap, so Yao Wenyu did not feel cold. He broke the silence, "If it's him..."

"If it's Shao Fengquan, why did Shao Chengbi bring along the firearms?" Shen Zechuan propped up his head with his left hand, his train of thoughts running along smoothly in the warm tent. "Shao Chengbi knew the firearms were replaced to give to the Fanzhou bandits. He understood that this batch of firearms is not usable, but he still brought them along."

Shao Chengbi came to meet death in the face all to give Shen Zechuan a reason to attack the City of Dancheng. He had hundreds of ways at his disposal; he did not need the firearms to further compound the issue—unless this batch of firearms was not meant to be used at all.

Qiao Tianya, who had been leaning back in his chair, abruptly sat upright. After a moment of silence, he said, "Uncle Shao is trying to tell Your Lordship who the Scorpion is."

The firearms were given to King Yi by the Scorpion in Zhongbo, and this Scorpion in Zhongbo got them from the Scorpion in Qudu. Chen Zhen could transfer the firearms around, and he held the blueprint in hand, but strangely enough, he had totally no knowledge of the loss of firearms from the Chunquan Battalion.

"The one who has eyes and ears everywhere is none other than a eunuch." A strange feeling overcame Shen Zechuan. Some of the matters he had been clear on began to blur, while those that had been obscured started to clear up. "Lu Guangbai told me that the one who swapped out the Bianjun Commandery's military grains is the army-supervising eunuch, Yingxi."

"If that is the case, then Fuman is a scapegoat," Yao Wenyu said, "and Xue Yanqing is a shield."

"This blade," Shen Zechuan's brows creased in a slight frown, "is a little inscrutable."

"Where exactly are you from?"

Xue Xiuzhuo squatted before Fuman and examined Fuman's expression.

After all the brutal tortures, Fuman was only left with a layer of skin. He had no tongue, and could only glare at Xue Xiuzhuo with bulging eyes as he opened and closed his lips. Behind Xue Xiuzhuo, Ya-er attempted to stuff the paper and brush he was holding into Fuman's hands, but all ten of Fuman's fingers were broken. He was already a disabled person on the last legs of his life.

Xue Xiuzhuo did not expect the Scorpions to move this fast. This was simply the same as the time they forsook Wei Huaigu back then. He stood up and said, "You are a eunuch who entered the palace during the reign of Yongyi, who has served Emperor Guangcheng. Later, Pan Rugui died, and Xiao Chiye recommended you during the public ditches case. Only then did you start to make your mark. Subsequently, you sent your godson, Yingxi, to Qidong to supervise their army and indicated to him to switch the Bianjun Commandery's military grains. You meant to make the Bianjun Commandery suffer a defeat and open up the Qidong's line of defense for Amu'er."

Gurgling sounds rang out from Fuman's throat. He touched the chains with whatever was left of his fingers and lay on the ground with his eyes staring unblinkingly at Xue Xiuzhuo.

Military and political changes were bound to be inextricably linked. Back then, after the military defeat case, Hai Liangyi and the other court ministers noticed the aberration in Dazhou. Since the beginning of the Yongyi reign, they were fighting tooth and nail with the noble clans, stuck in a stalemate between the collision of two powers. But after the military defeat case, the situation no longer developed in the way either party envisaged. The one who unmasked his true nature and gave himself away was Hua Siqian. He was too overly flustered when Hai Liangyi was chasing down the accounts, and colluded with the Biansha Cavalry to ink a debt of blood in the six prefectures. Xue Xiuzhuo, who was then Chief Supervising Secretary for the Ministry of Revenue, clearly saw the transfer of grains and silvers.

Xue Xiuzhuo turned back and muttered to himself, "But Lu Guangbai did not die. Instead, he took the Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops with him and deserted. Qi Zhuyin swiftly returned to defense mode, and Qidong remained impregnable. Your plan failed, so Amu'er transferred Hasen away and started to launch a major offensive against Libei."

This was the entire gist of the Bianjun Commandery's military grains case.

Fuman exhaled through his nostrils and swiveled his eyes around listlessly as he started to get all worked up.

The leading factor in the Libei's military grains case was Wei Huaigu, who colluded with the Juexi officials to resell the grains to Zhongbo for huge profits. In the process, they replaced Libei military grains with moldy grains, and this matter was exposed by the relay report from Yang Cheng. The report was originally meant to be submitted directly to the Ministry of Justice, but instead, it was sent to the Ministry of Revenue on its arrival at Qudu. Both Xue Xiuzhuo and Shen Zechuan thought this to be a move to threaten Wei Huaigu, because, at that time, Xiao Chiye kept his grip on the case and refused to let go, and they had to make a quick decision to cut their losses and kick Wei Huaigu out. Only then could they ensure that the other Scorpions hiding in Qudu would not be implicated.

In that case, who else was a part of these "others" apart from Fuman?

Fuman's bloody palm scraped across the ground as he strained himself to scrawl in an attempt to tell Xue Xiuzhuo something. Streaks of blood intersected on the ground, and his breathing gradually grew heavier. All of a sudden, he heard the door to the cell open.

"Your Excellency," Fengquan stood outside the door as per the regulations. "The relay report said the defectors have arrived. The Grand Secretary and Her Majesty are both waiting in Mingli Hall for Your Excellency to head over for a discussion."

As the cell was dimly lit and the hall was brighter, Fengquan's bowing shadow crept into the cell and shrouded Fuman. Fuman looked as if he had been bitten by a snake, his tears and sweating flowing as he stared at Xue Xiuzhuo's back. He parted his lips, but could make no sound.

Fengquan made way for Xue Xiuzhuo. After the latter left, his gaze shifted back to Fuman. Fuman panted for breath heavily, his chest heaving. The corner of his lips was still drooling with clear fluid that could not be concealed. Fengquan circled around him to size him up. When the cell door was shut tight, he kicked Fuman with his foot.

"What were you going to tell Xue Yanqing?" Fengquan looked at the criss-cross of bloodstains on the ground, and understanding dawned on him. "You wanted to write my name."

Fuman attempted to escape from Fengquan's shadow, but he could not move.

"Don't rush it." Fengquan gripped Fuman's wrist and led him to write on the ground, stroke by stroke. "Hush. Listen to me. Even if you tell him, he won't believe you. When the time is right, I will tell him myself. All clever people need such a lesson like this."

Fuman's entire arm was trembling.

The bloodstains on the ground increased as Fengquan stubbornly persisted in writing. Leading Fuman, he turned a stroke in the "feng" that Fuman had written into a crooked "kill".<sup>136</sup>

"Hang in there," Fengquan said in a feminine manner. "I will not treat you unjustly."

Tantai Hu finished the headcount of the garrison troops but did not see Liu Kong, so he asked around, only to realize that Liu Kong had really gone missing.

"That son of a bitch had better not flee before the battle." Tantai Hu gripped the name roster. "I must have been blind, putting in all my effort to nurture him!"

"He waited for both sides to suffer casualties, but he didn't expect His Lordship to have such incredible foresight. If he stays on any longer, he won't be able to make his escape." Seeing no one else around, Yu Xiaozai whispered quietly to Tantai Hu, "When you report it to His Lordship later, just say it as it is. Don't say a word more than necessary."

It was only then it hit Tantai Hu. He blurted in shock, "You're saying that Liu Kong is the spy?! He fought battles too when he followed me to Duanzhou! Besides, as Qiao Tianya said, what's the point of him giving us the runs?!"

Unable to explain it, Yu Xiaozai simply said, "Just report to His Lordship as is, and His Lordship will understand. What I'm worried about now is that the traitor behind him will run too now that he has fled!"

Tantai Hu felt a chill run down his back. He took a few steps out, then backtracked and said quietly, "Tell me on the sly, so I know how things stand and prepare myself for it. The advisors all love to speak incisively in profound terms. If they don't say the name, I won't be able to guess it. I may have a bad temper and erred back in Dunzhou, but I don't think I have ever offended anyone. This crook has to have a reason for doing this to me!"

So Yu Xiaozai stretched out a finger to point to the south, looking to be in a spot. "This... sigh, you just got caught in the crossfire."

Officialdom was like a spiderweb where every thread and node was intricately connected. Any single promotion or dismissal could cause repercussions within its range. Yu Xiaozai could not say it, for he had no evidence. If he spoke up rashly, he would be suspected of ostracizing fellow officials.

Chazhou, which was under Luo Mu's charge, was the main gate to the trade route between Huaizhou, Cizhou, and Chazhou. In the earliest days, Shen Zechuan had no one under his command. As Chazhou's prefecture perfect, Luo Mu held the three powers – legislative, executive, and judicial – in hand, and no one other than the Imperial Cavalry censors could restrain him. In any work he did, he only had to send in a request document to ask Shen Zechuan; he had no need to seek another's opinion. Over time, Shen Zechuan would lose the "eyes" he left in Chazhou. As such, when Wang Xian, who came from the Ministry of Revenue, made his appearance, Shen Zechuan immediately had him assigned to Chazhou.

Wang Xian had the power and authority to administer the economy of Chazhou, and he took over the management of Chazhou's Tax Circuit Intendants and taxation of the commoners' fields. This, in truth, had already split away Luo Mu's powers. Luo Mu wanted to take Wang Xian out of the game, but he could not impeach the latter or stir up trouble. The safest way was to strike at him by leveraging someone else's might. The Dunzhou yamen bore ill will towards Tantai Hu. Tantai Hu was impulsive and prone to causing trouble, and he had no personal relationship with Luo Mu. Luo Mu arranged for Liu Kong to go over and planted him by Tantai Hu's side. It just so happened that Wang Xian had to make arrangements for the military grains. When both encountered each other, no doubt a dispute would arise. Tantai Hu was also Xiao Chiye's trusted aide, and Wang Xian could not afford to offend him, so he could only take the matter to Shen Zechuan. Were Shen Zechuan to probe into the matter, he would be probing the Dunzhou yamen and Tantai Hu, which had nothing at all to do with Luo Mu.

With this move, Luo Mu could plant his own man in the Dunzhou garrison troops and, at the same time, make Wang Xian lose Shen Zechuan's favor. What was the relationship between Xiao Chiye and Shen Zechuan? If Wang Xian insisted on stirring up trouble with Tantai Hu, he would be putting both the Prefectural Lord and Second Master in a spot.

Shen Zechuan assigned Yu Xiaozai to supervise the army, and Yu Xiaozai was an official from Qudu. If Yu Xiaozai were to screw things up in the Dunzhou garrison troops, he would become a spy in collusion with Qudu. Then Wang Xian, who was similarly an official from the capital, would surely be implicated.

This was called “striking a cow from the other side of the mountain”.<sup>137</sup>

This matter was initially a done deal, but Shao Chengbi proved to be a stroke of bad luck. Luo Mu himself probably did not expect that the viceroy Qudu had carefully selected was here to throw his life away. Long before the Capital Command Troops came attacking, Liu Kong sensed Yu Xiaozai watching him, so of course, he would seize his opportunity during the chaos to run once the battle started.

“Quick, go and inform His Lordship.” Yu Xiaozai lifted the hem of his robe and walked toward the other end. “I have to ask Fei Sheng if the Imperial Bodyguards set up in Chazhou have been withdrawn!”

Fei Sheng was in the midst of having his meal. After hearing Yu Xiaozai’s question, he replied in puzzlement as he held his bowl in his hands, “Of course, they had been withdrawn. At that time, when His Lordship went over to Duanzhou, he wanted to establish the Imperial Cavalry. We don’t have enough manpower, and there’s you to supervise the various regions’ yamen. So my men were all withdrawn.”

Yu Xiaozai promptly exclaimed in shock, his face turning pale as he said, “Oh no, Old Fei, this is bad!”

Xue Xiuzhuo braved the rain to make his way over to Mingli Hall. When he entered, he saw everyone wearing a myriad of expressions.

“News came in earlier.” Cen Yu gestured for Xue Xiuzhuo to look at the letter. “Luo Mu of Chazhou brought along 20,000 garrison troops to defect to us!”

“I suspect it’s a trap Shen Zechuan laid,” Kong Qiu said. “Why would Luo Mu take such a risk instead of remaining in his position as the prefectural prefect of Chazhou?”

“Firstly, because of the imperial court’s reward of one million,” Chen Zhen said. “And secondly, because he is sincerely loyal to the state. He was forced to submit to the rebels against his own will. From what he said in the letter, he already had the intent to switch allegiances a long time ago.

However, Shen Zechuan had misgivings of him, and that was why it was only until today that he dared to risk his life to come to the state's rescue."

"The garrison troops from Huaizhou are still on the way." Li Jianting stood beside her desk. "If Luo Mu is already on his way, then going by the timing, he will arrive a few days later."

"Dancheng is already lost to us. Assemble the remaining Capital Command Troops," Xue Xiuzhuo said. "Together with the men Luo Mu brought with him, we still have 30,000 soldiers. Qi Zhuyin wants to betray the state. Sure. Grand Secretary, please write a letter to Qi Shiyu and ask him if he wants to turn traitor too."

He folded up the letter.

"Midway in his journey, Luo Mu can intimidate Hezhou to make the Yan clan of Hezhou hand over their remaining grains as well as cut off Shen Zechuan's grains route. Without Chazhou and Hezhou, Shen Zechuan would be no different from having an arm severed. We are lacking in grains, so his grains have to be depleted too—Now that the 90,000 Armored Cavalry soldiers have penetrated deep into the desert, for each day Xiao Chiye doesn't return, Shen Zechuan will be hard-pressed to forge ahead."

NOTICE:

New updated Character Chart from the QJJ Simplified CN Physical Copy!
Check out the Character Glossary!

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Novel || Author || JJWXC || Audio Drama

ALL

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 绣春刀 The Xiuchun Blade was the blade of the Imperial Bodyguards during the Ming Dynasty.
2. 狼烟 specifically smoke of wolves' dung burnt to indicate the presence of hostile forces

- 3.
4. 头车 literally head cart according to sources; a complex siege weapon used for mining which can also be used as a protective cover during a siege.

- 5.
6. 包袱, a cloth bundle. In the old days, people traveled around with their clothes and possessions bundled up with a piece of cloth.

The bundle was then worn across the shoulders and carried around. It also works for carrying food around.

7. 狼烟 specifically smoke of wolves' dung burnt to indicate the presence of hostile forces

8.

9. 单梢炮 Single-component catapults, or one-branch trebuchet

10. 浮萍 also refer to a person who wanders from place to place; a drifter with an uncertain life

單梢砲

- 11.
12. 单梢炮 Single-component catapults, or one-branch trebuchet
13. 玉带 literally jade belt, or belts made of jade worn by high-level government officials in the course of duty. It's also a term in Fengshui where the road surrounds the building, much like how the jade belt embraces the waist of the wealthy in graceful semicircular arcs.
14. 车轮战 the tactic of several persons or groups taking turns in fighting one opponent in order to wear him down (kind of attrition warfare)
15. Presumably, it explicitly refers to his blade ("this blade of mine") but the way it is phrased also can be read as referring to himself as the blade ("this blade that is me")
16. Refer to chapter 174
17. 赤缙 also refers to light red.

18.

19. 门闩 it's a bolt in the shape of a horizontal bar , or rod, that's used to hold a door closed in ancient days. Could be long or short. Something like the above.

20. Full line is:

The passage of heavy frost through the lands leaves not a blade of grass in its wake.

Refer to chapter 211

21. Just a note that he literally said 蛇 which is “snake”, although what he meant was 四脚蛇 literally “four-legged snake”, i.e., lizard.

22. 四脚蛇 is also literally translated as “four-legged snake”, aka lizard.

23. 黄册 Huangce or literally yellow registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household's classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.

24. Youxiong is a tribe that takes the bear as its totem. The Biansha Tribes' names are based on animals. For a list, you can refer to to the worldmap.

25. Refer to 242

26. For those who forgot, refer to chapter 250, returning of the head to the Biansha Tribes is considered a humiliation of sorts.

27. 既然 jiran literally means “since”

28. 元气 or yuan qi, or primordial qi, or vital energy, is the fundamental qi we are born with.

29. Just a note that it actually said “mother“ in the raws, not sure if it was an unintentional typo. As usual, will double check with the traditional chinese physical copy when it is released.
30. A practice in former times where two locks of hair from the husband and wife are bound together during the wedding as a symbol of lasting union.
31. 小师父 Little shifu, or Little (Venerable) Master, the shifu here is term of respect for a monk or nun and is not referring to Jiran as Qiao Tianya’s martial art master.
32. 施主 shizhu, or benefactor, patron; term used by monks or nuns as a general term of address towards laymen; also used by Buddhist monks or Taoist priests for someone who has contributed to a monastery or temple.
33. This shifu here is legit his shifu lol. To distinguish between the shifu, we’ll be using shifu for one’s master and little (venerable) master as the monk address for Jiran.
34. “绿水无忧，因风而皱；青山不老，为雪白头① by Shen Yi-fu (沈义甫)
35. 因缘 in Buddhism, all things, phenomena, and social activities are believed arise out of the combinations of causes (因) and conditions (緣) (i.e., primary cause and secondary causes that combines to bring about a result, or effect (果). 因缘 also refers to predestined relationship or affinity.
36. “一切有为法，如梦幻泡影，如露亦如电，应作如是观。” from the Diamond Sutra 《金刚经》 Basically, all phenomena are fleeting and ephemeral, so we should treat them as such.
37. Refer to chapter 184
38. 向死而生 “being-towards-death”, a concept by German philosopher Martin Heidegger. According to Heidegger, the human being is a “being toward death” (Being and Time), one who cannot fully live an authentic life unless one confronts one’s own mortality.
39. 相 in Buddhism at its most basic refers to form or appearance, etc of all things. Sort of mean how he still has an attachment to all things/phenomena/etc in the secular world and can’t renounce the world just yet.
40. Refer to chapter 203

41. This is the mute lad mentioned in chapter 221, will use Ya'er ("mute lad") as his name.
42. Having a son to carry on the family line is considered an act of filial piety in ancient times.
43. i.e., tom, dick, and harry
44. Does not refer to real descendants but the people under his "protection," just like how Fengquan was Pan Rugui's god-grandson and Ji Lei was Pan Rugui's godson. So this eunuch has to be someone with high rank and power in the palace who can bring some benefit to his 'descendants', such as better treatment and opportunities, etc.
45. 老祖宗 literally old ancestor or forefather; sometimes the top eunuch in the Ming Dynasty is privately addressed as such
46. 太祖 Taizu, Great (Imperial) Ancestor ; usually the posthumous title of the first emperor (or founder) of a new dynasty.
47. Refers to Pan Rugui
48. 铁券 iron plaque, conferred by the emperor on a distinguished minister as a special honor. It is being used here as a "free-pass".
49. 军屯 military troops (mostly in border regions) who carry out garrison duties and farm crops to supply the border garrisons with grains.

- 50.
51. 杏眼 almond eyes; a kind of eye shape said to give off a younger, adorable or pure vibe.
52. 三姓家奴 literally, a slave with three surnames. The term originates from the Romance of the Three Kingdoms 《三国演义》 and refers specifically to Lu Bu. It's used mockingly to refer to capricious, disloyal and unrighteous people who serve traitors.

53. 治大国若烹小鲜 literally, ruling a large state is like cooking/steaming/boiling a small fish. Just as one should not turn small fish too frequently when cooking lest they break apart, the ruler of a big country should not make unpredictable changes in policy or otherwise interfere too much in the lives of the people, but instead should respect the natural order of society, from Tao Te Ching (Daodejing) 《道德经》 by Laozi
54. As offerings. The burning of offerings is considered an expression of filial piety to provide the deceased with the means to enjoy the comforts of what they once had when they were alive.
55. 旌旗十万斩阎罗<sup>①</sup> Original quote “此去泉台招旧部 旌旗十万斩阎罗。” “I shall head to the netherworld to summon my former [deceased] comrades and, with a banner of 10,000 [soldiers], slay the King of Hell (a reference to the Kuo//min//tang here)” from “The Three Chapters of Meiling” 《梅岭三章》 by Chen Yi (陈毅).
56. 斩阎罗 Zhan Yan Luo, aka, Slay(er of) the King of Hell
57. 年号 reign title a designation for the years when an emperor was on the throne
58. 盛胤 the name Shengyin would translate to “prosperity for posterity“.
59. It says Marquis of Bianbo in this chapter. Previously in earlier chapters, it was Marquis of Biansha, and then he got “promoted” to Earl of Biansha. Will double-check with the traditional Chinese copy when it is released.
60. 异姓王 Specifically princes, or lords, with different surnames from the imperial family These were conferred princes who were bestowed the title by the Emperor.
61. 三人成虎, literally three men make a tiger. i.e., three people spreading reports of a tiger would make one believe that there is really one around. Basically, a repeated rumor becomes a ‘fact’.
62. From here onwards, Li Jianting used “朕” (zhen) to refer to herself (unless stated otherwise). It’s an imperial term for “I” exclusively used by the Emperor. It differentiates the monarch from all his people and subjects.
63. 异姓王 Specifically princes, or lords, with different surnames from the imperial family. These were conferred princes who were bestowed the title by the Emperor.

64. * Li Jianting used the common “I” (我) here (marked with *), then reverted to the imperial “I” (朕) used exclusively by the emperor.
65. 君臣本同治乱，共安危 from “Essentials of Government in the Zhenguan Reign” 《贞观政要》 is a compendium on statecraft during the Zhenguan reign (627-649) in the Tang Dynasty.
66. 舌上有龙泉，杀人不见血 i.e., Words (of a sharp-tongued person) can do serious harm; from “Essentials of Government in the Zhenguan Reign” 《贞观政要》 is a compendium on statecraft during the Zhenguan reign (627-649) in the Tang Dynasty. Longquan refers to a city in southern Zhejiang province where famous Longquan swords are made.
67. 二叔 er'shu (for Xiao Chiye) vs. 二叔叔 er'shushu (for Shen Zechuan). 叔叔 as “uncle” refers to one’s father’s younger brother and is also a child’s form of address for any young man one generation older.
68. The full line, “以铜为镜，可以正衣冠；以史为镜，可以知兴替；以人为镜，可以明得失” by Tang Taizong (唐太宗); He who uses bronze as his mirror can tidy his apparel; He who uses history as a mirror can know of the rise and fall of a dynasty; he who uses people as his mirror can understand successes and failures.
69. 企者不立，跨者不行 from 《道德经》 Tao Te Ching (Daodejing) by Laozi
70. 清谈 Qingtan is a Chinese philosophical movement and social practice among political and intellectual elites where the literati engaged in highly sophisticated intellectual and philosophical discussions on lofty and non-mundane matters.
71. A variant of 天下英雄入吾彀中矣 “all heroes of the world have fallen into my trap” spoken by Tang Taizong in reference to the imperial examinations, which not only build a meritocratic government but also replace martial conflicts for civil examinations. The people, in voluntarily choosing to take the examinations, thus fall into Taizong’s “trap”, spending their lives dedicated to studying the classics (which instill precisely the values that keep the emperor in power) rather than rising in rebellions, etc.
72. His name means 延 (extend/prolong/engage) 清 (clear/pure/upright/impartial)

73. 太祖 Taizu, Great (Imperial) Ancestor “; usually the posthumous title of the first emperor (or founder) of a new dynasty.
74. 乱世用重典, Govern with severe punishments in turbulent times. i.e., the rulers should impose strict laws and inflict severe punishments in turbulent times, especially as a deterrent, from “Grand Pronouncements of Ming” (明大诰).
75. 份子钱 gift money that is given during occasions like weddings, birth of a child, etc
76. 清谈 Qingtán is a Chinese philosophical movement and social practice among political and intellectual elites where the literati engaged in highly sophisticated intellectual and philosophical discussions on lofty and non-mundane matters.
77. specifically elder sister and younger brother
78. 见字如晤 literally seeing this letter is akin to a meeting in person. It’s commonly used in old times as an opening, sort of like “I hope this letter finds you well” in modern times.

79.

80. 团领衫 or 圆领袍 round-collared robe/attire typically worn by officials in the Ming Dynasty.

81. 亩, mu, or Chinese acre, measure of land equal to 0.0667 hectares

82. 掌中物 literally object in one's palm, also used to refer to being in one's control.

83. 沈腰潘鬓 shen yao pan bin (the 'shen' here is the same 'shen' in Shen Zechuan); refers to a man with a frail body and premature graying of hair.

84. 萧郎 Xiao-lang (the 'xiao' here is the same 'xiao' in Xiao Chiye); 郎 -lang, young man; a form of address that is also used as a term to address a lover or husband. So if your lover has the surname Zhang (张), you would be calling him Zhang-lang (zhanglang written in different characters btw, also means cockroach); 萧郎 Xiaolang as a whole also refers to a male lover or beloved in poetry.

85. Anitabha, or Amitabha, read with Jiran's accent.
86. The official title is Tax Circuit Intendant,(督粮道) but it's also a counterpart of Grain Tax Circuit (粮储道). Literally though, 督粮道 is "Grain-supervisory Circuit".
87. Households were classified and recorded into the Huangce or yellow registers/yellow book (黄册) according to their occupation to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian (民户), military (军户), and craftsman.
88. 打肿脸(充胖子) slap one's face until it's swollen (in an effort to look imposing); to do something beyond one's means in order to be impressive
89. 宝剑锋从磨砺出 The sharp edge of a treasured sword is the result of honing. i.e., one's mettle or abilities have to be honed in order to become useful and outstanding
90. 车到山前必有路 i.e., things will always sort themselves out; cross the bridge when you come to it.

91.

92.

93. 独轮车 i.e., a kind of wheelbarrow

94. 都军 it is also used as another name for the Imperial Army during the Song Dynasty, but to make it less confusing, we'll use Capital Command Troops, aka troops in active service in the capital
95. 伯乐 a figure famed for his ability to judge the quality of horses. Refers to someone who is a good judge of talents.
96. 帝王之道：制衡之术 art of rulership/governance of ruler: The technique of checks and balances was one of the most common political tools used by the emperors in ancient China to govern their officials.

97.

98. 太师椅 Taishi Chair or Grand Preceptor Chair, is a classical style of a wooden armchair in ancient China.

99.

100. A form of hand exercise using a pair Baoding balls, designed to help relieve stress while building finger dexterity and wrist and forearm strength. We all know what you're thinking though. (° 5 °)

101.

102.里 li, an ancient measure of length, 1 li is approx. 500m

103.吴下阿蒙 General Lu Meng (from the Three Kingdoms Period) was originally uneducated, but he later devoted himself to studying for many years, becoming so knowledgeable and wise that he surprised Lu Su, who said to him, “You are no longer A-Meng from Wu”. Now used as a model of self-improvement through diligent study.

104.水(至)清则无鱼 literally, water that is too clean has no(/few) fish, i.e., one should not demand absolute purity; you cannot expect everyone to be squeaky clean.

105.Chrysanthemums, which symbolize longevity, bloom around the ninth lunar month, also called “the month of chrysanthemum”. It is also customary to hold chrysanthemums appreciation sessions during the Double Ninth (Chongyang) Festival. Chrysanthemum is also one of the Four Gentlemen (along with plum, orchid, and bamboo) in Chinese art, which compares them to the Confucian junzi, or “gentlemen”.

106.硕鼠 a large rat; a metaphor for a greedy official who levies and collects money.

107.太宗 taizong, posthumous name given to second emperor of a dynasty

108.木秀于林，风必摧之；堆出于岸，流必湍之 from “On Fortune And Destiny” 《运命论》 by Li Kang (李康). I.e., a person who is too outstanding will incur jealousy and is easily subjected to attacks and slanders.

109.名帖 (also 拜帖), a name card (or visitation card) written on paper or wood used by officials, nobles, or distinguished people to notify the other party of their visit. It would usually indicate his name, position, and so on.

110.天理 “Law/Principles of Heaven” i.e., feudal ethics as propounded by the Confucianists in the Song Dynasty

111.任贤必治，任不贤必乱 (original line 任贤必治，任不肖必乱) from “Historical Events Retold as a Mirror for Government” 《资治通鉴》 compiled by Sima Guang.

112.明者，销祸于未萌 from “Historical Events Retold as a Mirror for Government” 《资治通鉴》 compiled by Sima Guang.

113.穷则思变 literally one will start thinking about changes when he is in extreme poverty (or when he hits rock bottom or is at the end of his resources).

114. Based on “君王死社稷” the sovereign die for the state from “The Books of Rites” 《礼记》

115.物不极则不反，恶不极则不亡 from “Historical Events Retold as a Mirror for Government” 《资治通鉴》 compiled by Sima Guang.

116.一春秋 also refers to a year

117.招文袋 a small bag hung at the waist for keeping documents or money.

118. The first two characters for “moon over pines” (松月, literally pine moon) are the same characters for Qian Tianya’s name, Songyue.

119. The first two characters for “wind and spring” (风泉, literally wind spring) are the same characters as the name of the eunuch, Fengquan.

120.松月生夜凉，风泉满清听 “Overnight at Master’s Mountain Lodge When Ding the Eldest (Ding Feng) Failed to Arrive” 《宿业师山房待丁大不至》 by Meng Haoran (孟浩然), a Tang dynasty poet.

121.长生牌 Longevity tablet, a tablet used to pray for the blessings of one’s benefactors. (As opposed to ancestral tablets to pray to one’s dead ancestors.)

- 122.批红 compilation of an endorsement on a memorial; chief eunuchs had the right to note down remarks in red color (pihong 批紅) on the incoming memorials, even before the Emperor had seen them.
- 123.老祖宗, lao-zuzong or old/senior forefather/ancestor is also used to address the top eunuch. 小祖宗 xiao-zuzong or little/junior forefather/ancestor is also used as “little brat/little devil”.
- 124.酷吏 specifically officials who used harsh laws or torture to brutalize the people.
- 125.It was Emperor Guangcheng in the jjwxc version but edited to Emperor Yongyi (after the name of his reign) in the simplified Chinese physical copy. As usual, the final copy will be double-checked against and based on the traditional Chinese physical copy when it is released. Please bear with us for now.
- 126.Specifically to retire after achieving success.
- 127.纸贵 literally paper expensive. When a work is so popular everyone is copying it to circulate it, leading to paper shortage and causing the price of paper to skyrocket.
- 128.黄册 Huangce or yellow registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household’s classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.
- 129.火牌 military token/tally/seal or warrant to identify and authenticate soldiers delivering urgent messages.
- 130.急递铺 urgent delivery station or express post station. Together with the relay (post) stations, they formed the “arteries and veins” of the Ming Empire, working together to circulate people, information, and goods throughout the lands.
- 131.Supposedly, to repay the debt he owes his son in this life.
- 132.玉牒 literally jade records; i.e., genealogy record of the imperial family
- 133.朱批/朱砂印 literally vermilion or cinnabar seal as authentication
- 134.太祖 Taizu, Great (Imperial) Ancestor “; usually the posthumous title of the first emperor (or founder) of a new dynasty.
- 135.Yellow was the color of the emperor.

136.狼烟(台) specifically smoke of wolves' dung burnt to indicate the presence of hostile forces

137.For those still confused, Li Jianting is the end result when Emperor Guangcheng forced himself on his daughter-in-law, aka Prince Qin's wife, so if you were to really go into it, she's both Emperor Guangcheng's daughter and granddaughter.

138.水满则溢，月盈则缺。 Water brims only to overflow, the moon waxes only to wane. i.e., things/situations reverse when they reach their extreme or limit.

139.异姓王 Specifically princes, or lords, with different surnames from the imperial family These were conferred princes who were bestowed the title by the Emperor, so naturally, they can be stripped of the title by the emperor too.

140.当头棒喝 literally, a blow to the head or a loud shout; i.e., a stern advice/criticism or a severe shock that brings one to a sudden realization of the error of one's thinking/ways. From a traditional Chan (Zen) Buddhist teaching method where a monk would often hit a beginner student on the head or shout loudly at him to shock him out of his erroneous thinking and help him achieve enlightenment.

141.定海神针 literally "The Sea-Anchoring Divine Needle".

According to the novel Journey to the West 《西游记》，this was a divine 'needle' (or pole) that could shrink and grow according to its owner's wish. At first, it was a treasure of the Eastern Sea Dragon King's Dragon Palace, but Sun Wukong (孙悟空) later took it away to use as his weapon and changed the needle's name to the Ruyi Golden Cudgel (如意金箍棒). It's used to refer to a stabilizing force.

142.长明灯 changming lamp (or literally eternally bright lamp), an altar lamp that is kept burning day and night usually set in front of a memorial tablet on the family's ancestral altar as a visible aspect of ancestor veneration.

143.纲常 i.e., the three cardinal ethical relationships of social order (including the relationship between the ruler and his subject, father and son, husband and wife) and the five constant virtues in Confucianism.

144.三姓家奴 literally, a slave with three surnames. The term originates from the Romance of the Three Kingdoms 《三国演义》 and refers specifically to Lu Bu. It's used mockingly to refer to capricious, disloyal and unrighteous people who serve traitors.

145. 卖身契 more specifically, it's an indenture or a deed of sale of oneself or one's family member to someone else (e.g., into slavery, etc, or in Qiao Tianya's case, to repay a debt.)

146. For those interested in the actual characters in Chinese, Fuman wrote “风” which is the “feng” in “Fengquan”. Fengquan changed the “X”-like stroke into “杀”, or “sha”, which means kill.

147. A martial arts move where one hits an enemy from a distance away without actually laying hands on said person. i.e., to deal an indirect strike

◇ CHAPTER 273: REVEAL ◇

Note:

The titles in chapter 273, 274 – Reveal (显山), Unveil (露水) – are from the idiom “显山露水”. i.e., to reveal or flaunt one’s talents or the facts.

Located to the east of Gedale, Mosanchuan made its name from the three rivers stretching uninterruptedly into the desert, where several li of barren shores and the Gobi Desert lay, adorned only by swathes of desert poplar trees.

It was already dark in Qudu at this moment, but here, it was still evening.

Xiao Chiye pillowed his head on both arms and watched the last sunset.

The sky of Mosanchuan was so vast that if one were to lie on the sandy ground and watch for long, they would have the illusion of being embraced in heaven’s arms. Like flowing syrup, the viscous glow of the sunset flooded over the earth.

Meng landed beside Xiao Chiye and hopped onto his chest. Xiao Chiye had been holding a straw of grass in his mouth, which he spat out when he felt the weight on his chest as Meng stepped on him.

“Hey,” Xiao Chiye said, “You’re so heavy, gege.”

Meng cocked its head and looked askance at him with the eye on one side.

Xiao Chiye could only free an arm and ruffle Meng's feathers. He whistled at Lang Tao Xue Jin, which was by the stream drinking water, and indicated for it to come over and take Meng away to play. Lang Tao Xue Jin, however, trod on its front hooves and turned its ass around to continue drinking the water.

The Armored Cavalry had been stationed here for a few days already. Lu Guangbai took off his helmet and patted off the sand all over him as he walked over.

"Commander-in-chief Xiao." Lu Guangbai's neck was damp with sweat. He followed Xiao Chiye's gaze and looked to the west. "Laid-back, aren't you?"

"That, I'm not. I'm miserable deep down." As if that was very much the case, Xiao Chiye pointed to the west with the hand he used to stroke Meng. "My wife is over there at that end, his face awash in tears every day as he awaits my return home."

"Put it on the record." Lu Guangbai tossed the helmet to Chen Yang. "Go back and tell that to your household's prefectural lord, and we'll see exactly whose face it is that's awash in tears."

Xiao Chiye waited for Lu Guangbai to sit down before asking. "What did the Mengtuo Tribe say?"

"Same old words." Lu Guangbai propped himself on his knees. "Baya'er is determined to betroth his daughter to you. If you don't want his daughter, then he will decline to form an alliance with the Libei Armored Cavalry."

"Baya'er, that old blockhead of a camel."<sup>122</sup> Xiao Chiye sat up, and some of the sand of his back slid off. He looked at Lu Guangbai. "He wants to give me his daughter because he's afraid that I'll cast him aside after he has served his purpose, so he wants to trap me with a woman. If I were really such a disloyal and unrighteous man, I'd still kill him even if he gives me his wife."

Lu Guangbai pointed at Xiao Chiye and said, "You went and met him with this expression. Of course he's scared."

Xiao Chiye's eyebrows lifted slightly. "It's not like I'm there to beg him."

"Keep on being hard-mouthed." Lu Guangbai said. "The territory of the Mengtuo Tribe is right at the western desert entrance of Mosanchuan, blocking it. If we can't win over Baya'er before attacking Amu'er, we risk falling into an encirclement trap."

"Then you tell him," Xiao Chiye folded his arm, "that I have a ferocious tiger<sup>123</sup> back at home. I am but a henpecked husband."

"He even has his daughter's dowry ready. He's just waiting for her to marry into your family and show proper respect to this 'eldest madam'." So troubled was Lu Guangbai that he could not help but laugh in spite of himself. "Everybody loves Xiao Ce'an."

The son-in-law that Baya'er had set his heart on was Hasen, but Hasen insisted on marrying Duo'erlan of the Hulu Tribe, which led to animosity between him and the Mengtuo Tribe. When Xiao Chiye came to discuss an alliance after Hasen's death in battle, Baya-er stood on the sand dunes and took note of Xiao Chiye's strapping tall height and distinguished air. What's more, Xiao Chiye was the alpha wolf of Libei who slew Hasen with his own hands, and so, Baya-er began to harbor the intent to marry his daughter to him.

"The Hulu Tribe has already retreated to the banks of Lake Chiti, so why are they back again?"

"You killed Hasen," Lu Guangbai said. "His wife rode east on horseback and brought back the warriors of the Youxiong Tribe that you broke up and pleaded with her tribesfolk who had retreated back to Lake Chiti to help Amu'er again. Duo'erlan swore before the Hongying banner of the great desert she will kill you."

Xiao Chiye remembered the flower that had floated away with the water before Hasen died.

"Also," Lu Guangbai curbed his smile. "Duo'erlan was already pregnant before she headed east. That's Hasen's posthumous child."

Xiao Chiye secured his arm guard in silence. The last light of the setting sun vanished, and a brief stillness materialized in the sky that had no sun and no moon. That smear of heavy blue enveloped the dome of heaven, and the cry of the falcon pierced through the banner. Long hair that fluttered in the wind spread under this blue sky as Duo'erlan supported her lower abdomen with her hands.

Bayin covered Duo'erlan with thick clothing and persuaded, "The night is cold. You should go back."

"My husband is in the west," Duo'erlan said softly with her head tilted high as she watched a goshawk fly across in the wind. "When will my Heroic Eagle return?”

Bayin could not bear to see her like this and felt the urge to wipe his tears.

“The wolves of Libei bit my elder brother to death, then bit my husband to death.” Hatred settled in Duo’erlan’s green eyes. “Bayin, he is here to kill my child.” She covered her abdomen, took two steps back, and said, “I want to protect my child.”

“The Hero will not let Xiao Chiye hurt you.” Bayin softened his voice. “Your father won’t either. The desert will work together to protect you, because this is Hasen’s child.”

“You’re wrong, Bayin. Look at the desert with your wise eyes. There are already three tribes following his Armored Cavalry.” Duo’erlan was almost shrinking into the wide outer robe. Her lean chin lay concealed within, and tears pooled in her heavy-hearted eyes. “In his quest for peace, Baya’er could even give his own daughter away to our enemy. No one other than Hasen can protect me.”

Sadness flashed across Bayin’s dark-skinned face. “I failed to accomplish what Hasen entrusted me with and was deceived by the Youxiong Tribe. I am Hasen’s wise man, yet I did not let him get the glory he deserved. Now that Xiao Chiye has come to the desert, Duo’erlan, we will take our revenge.”

Bayin took down the dagger at the side of his waist and held it in his palm as he handed it to Duo’erlan.

“I swear.”

To the wolf pup of my family, treat this letter as you would my person.

The bed in Cizhou has lain untouched in recent days. I’ve been staying in tents with the army, and sleep has proven elusive thus far.

Xiao Chiye looked at the words by the campfire, the forlorn ache in his chest dissolving away into a bittersweetness of knowing that he was being pined for. It was all his, Xiao Ce’an’s, chest that Lanzhou slept on behind closed doors. Without him, Lanzhou would sleep poorly, no matter how good the bed was. Xiao Chiye picked up On Horseback with his other hand and drank a mouthful, pouring that feeling onto his chest, lest he became too emotional. He continued reading as he drank.

Teacher left me a blade. Former minister, Shao Chengbi, was killed in battle. Everything in Qudu is in order and under control, so don’t worry. An expedition afar is arduous; you must take care of yourself. Er-lang, if we can win this battle, we will never part again in the years to come. A warm spring bed awaits homecoming in winter. I shall sleep thinking of you.

Xiao Chiye set down the wine bag and looked at the bottom, where Shen Zechuan had drawn a fox with drooping ears and a tail with a brush. He could not help but smile in spite of himself.

Lu Guangbai flung a sweet potato at Xiao Chiye, and Xiao Chiye caught it with a lightning move of his hand.

“It’s almost the eleventh month.” Lu Guangbai peeled the sweet potato and started eating it. “What do you have in mind for dealing with the Mengtuo Tribe?”

The position of the Mengtuo Tribe was special. Its chieftain, Baya’er, had batches of camels. If they were to throw in with Amu’er, Amu’er’s current food dilemma could be resolved. Horses from Libei or Qidong were, in fact, not suitable for making long journeys in the desert. If Baya’er could lead the Mengtuo Tribe into throwing in with the Libei Armored Cavalry, it would prove not only beneficial to the transportation of military grains during the war, but also prove advantageous to the mutual frontier trade in the future.

“Since he’s afraid that I’d turn against him after the fact...” Xiao Chiye opened up the bag that came along with the letter; it was all dried beef jerky inside. He tossed the bag with a “Lu” on it to Lu Guangbai and continued, “I’ll do just that.”

Lu Guangbai was already being polite, so Xiao Chiye had no need to continue keeping up with the courtesy. He had 90,000 Armored Cavalry, 10,000 Imperial Army, and 20,000 Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops. He did not come here to negotiate peace. He had already handed them the carrot from the Huiyan Tribe. Continue putting on airs, and he was going to use the stick.

“Tell Baya’er,” Xiao Chiye popped the beef jerky into his mouth and said, “I’m in a hurry to go home for the new year. If he wants to sink with Amu’er, I will send him on his way tonight.”

Chen Yang nodded to receive his order and called for someone to convey the message as he retreated.

There were no troops stationed in Dancheng once the Capital Command Troops withdrew. When the Dunzhou Garrison Troops entered the city, the entire city was dead silent. There were countless rumors of the Prefectural Lord of Zhongbo, Shen Zechuan, some fearsome, and some respectable. Commoners converged in the city. Quite a number of them had also fled to Qudu the same night.

Tantai Hu was well aware of the need to appease the people. This time, he did not dare to be sloppy and gave strict instructions for the garrison troops to behave themselves. He had come to grief because of Liu Kong, and so, he specially led his brothers from the Imperial Army, neither disturbing the commoners at night nor alarming them during the day.

Yao Wenyu, having spent nearly more than a month bent over the table, was taking a stroll near Dancheng with Shen Zechuan today. Looking at the mottled marks on the city wall, he said, "Dancheng has had a close call. Luo Mu has already arrived in Hezhou's territory with his garrison troops. Qudu will be hard to attack from now on. I heard the news today that Qi Shiyu sent three letters from home, urging Commander-in-chief Qi, who is still at Tianfei Watchtower, to return home."

"Qi Shiyu is paralyzed in bed and can't lead the troops." Shen Zechuan basked in the sun; it was a rare sunny day today. "All the men in the house cannot compare to Qi Zhuyin. Even if he really wants to dismiss Qi Zhuyin from her commander-in-chief position, he can't strip her of her commander-in-chief military power."

Qidong's vital point lay in Qi Zhuyin, so they had to be able to go for the jugular with a psychological attack when it came to Qi Shiyu.

"Qi Shiyu wavers between the noble clans and those of humble origins. As long as Your Lordship is willing to give him a promise," Yao Wenyu turned the wheelchair, "the merit in assisting the new emperor in creating a new reign will far surpass the ability to protect the current emperor."

They definitely had to make an issue of it. Shao Chengbi's mobilization of troops ended in defeat. Qudu had long been thrown into turmoil. This was just great now. Li Jianting's legitimacy was in question, and so was Shen Zechuan.

"Qi Shiyu is experienced, and he understands the stakes involved best. If I speak of the merit in assisting the new emperor in creating a new reign now, he might not necessarily dare to agree." There was no telling the state of Shen Zechuan's injury from his straightened waist. "Xue Xiuzhuo wants Luo Mu. I'll give him to him."

Qudu wanted the chess piece, Luo Mu. Shen Zechuan would not begrudge the loss.

The grains in Chazhou were distributed by Shen Zechuan, and Cai Yu was eliminated by Shen Zechuan too. All the revitalization of the various trade that followed after was aided by Shen Zechuan too. Luo Mu ran so fast precisely because he could not prise Shen Zechuan away, and since he had followed Cai Yu before, all those he could take away now were the bandits.

“But I want Jiang Qingshan.” Shen Zechuan looked back. “The only question is whether Xue Xiuzhuo can bear to give him up.”

Qudu fell further into desolation. As the eleventh month drew closer, the streets of the market became a lot more deserted. The news that the rebels had fought their way to Dancheng had spread. If not for the presence of the Capital Command Troops still stationed in the city, anarchy would have already broken out. Even so, the people still fretted with restlessness.

Kong Qiu, having already switched into a thicker robe, said to Cen Yu before he entered the palace, “The snow is going to fall early this year.”

Cen Yu raised his head to look at the sky. At that moment, he could not tell if Kong Qiu was talking about this sky or Dazhou. He let out a sigh and raised his arm to urge, “Let’s go.”

“I wrote Qi Shiyu a letter. He had his son answer.” Kong Qiu walked up the stairs. “He says that he is too ill to even get off the bed.”

“The aggravation of his illness is certainly very timely,” Cen Yu scoffed while lifting the hem of his robe.

Kong Qiu slowed down and said, “Qi Shiyu is a sly old fox. Rather than say he trims his sail to the wind, one might as well say he’s wisely playing it safe to save his skin. Even back at home, he knows very well that Qi Zhuyin didn’t deploy the troops, but he just has to wait for us to write to him before he starts putting on a show of cursing,” He said with a sigh, “He’s jacking up the price with us in a roundabout way.”

“Just you watch. When Her Majesty really confers upon him what his heart desires,” Cen Yu said, “he will then not dare to accept it!”

“We still have to send someone with the gift of the gab over.” Kong Qiu strode over the threshold. “I originally thought Chongshen would do, but he isn’t experienced enough to be able to hold down Qi Shiyu. After going back and forth choosing, Wanxiao is still the most suitable choice.”

It was only when Cen Yu heard Jiang Qingshan's name that he remembered. "Wanxiao just sent a letter saying that his wife is pregnant. He probably won't make a long-distance journey at this time."

"There's no one else left in the imperial court. If he doesn't go," Kong Qiu raised a finger to point at the palace wall, "Shen Zechuan will soon be here. I heard that Wanxiao's mother highly values ties. If it really doesn't work, we will get in touch with the Old Madam. If that doesn't work, then we'll get Wanxiao to bring his wife along."

Jiang Qingshan's wife, Liu-niang, had only just gotten pregnant, and what's more, she was nursed back to fertile health by a wandering physician from the martial art fraternity and was being cherished at home. But he could not disobey the imperial court order. The journey was a long one to make, and he was initially unwilling to bring Liu-niang along and subject her to the hardship of traveling, but if he were to leave Liu-niang at home, he did not know what kind of grief his mother would give her. So, after thinking it through, he eventually decided to bring her along.

The moment Jiang Qingshan set off, Jiran set out too.

Ding Tao brought Jiran to Qidong and paid a formal visit to Qi Zhuyin, who had rushed home to receive a tongue-lashing.

"His Lordship said that he heard the old commander-in-chief and eldest madam have been in ill health lately." Ding Tao bowed to Qi Zhuyin. "His Lordship has nothing to give, so he had me bring along his own physician to take a look at the old commander-in-chief and the eldest madam."

Qi Zhuyin saw Jiran looking all tranquil and at ease, not at all timid in the presence of others. His aura was special, and he really had an ethereal air to him. "Shen Zechuan must really lack manpower. Even you have stepped out to go on errands."

"Commander-in-chief Qi doesn't know it, but I have been the Second Master's guard since a few years ago." Ding Tao led Jiran over before Qi Zhuyin. "This is the Venerable Master Yideng's last disciple."

Qi Zhuyin was moved by the words "Yideng". Seeing as Jiran was young, she said, "... The old man has already retired for a rest today. I'll notify the rear yard in a while. Someone will naturally come to receive him."

Ding Tao and Jiran bowed in unison.

“Eldest Madam is exceedingly intelligent. She is familiar with the accounts, and her mental arithmetic is outstanding.” Yao Wenyu covered his lips and coughed twice. “It would be best to have her discuss with Jiang Qingshan.”

Shen Zechuan was in the midst of reading Ge Qingqing’s letter. On hearing that, he only asked Fei Sheng, “How long has Luo Mengzheng been gone for?”

“Almost half a month,” Fei Sheng answered.

“Even if he’s riding a tortoise, he should have reached Qudu by now.” Shen Zechuan closed the letter. “If the motley crew wants to guard the city gate, then let them do as they wish. No one can say for sure whether they are brave men or boors lured by reward. Shenwei should also take a break these few days. Push them into too tight a corner, and they might be driven to take desperate measures.”

Shen Zechuan did not fear those 30,000 to 40,000 motley crew of soldiers in Qudu. Even if he fell short, he still had Xiao Jiming behind him to back him up. A 30,000-strong Armored Cavalry was enough to intimidate Qudu. Xue Xiuzhuo was indeed formidable, but Xue Xiuzhuo did not have soldiers. Qudu wanted to coerce Qi Zhuyin into deploying troops, so Shen Zechuan would force down this blade that was Qi Zhuyin. It did not matter if he could not use her; just let those 300,000 main forces remain in place as decorations. Qudu could also forget about hoping that the Qidong Garrison Troop would be able to stride past Tianfei Watchtower. For the sake of maintaining stability in the area, he even had Huo Lingyun placed there.

“Tao Ming has been eating and drinking well in Cizhou. Now that he has grown some fat, he ought to start moving too.” The prefectural lord’s folding fan tapped gently against the edge of the table. “He is the prefectural prefect of a prefecture, after all. He’s as close as family to the people of Huaizhou. The anarchy in Huaizhou is intense. Give him a few thousand Cizhou Garrison Troops soldiers and send him back to quell the unrest. If he does well, he will be handsomely rewarded in the future. If not, have him leave his entire family in Cizhou for me to take care of.”

Xue Xiuzhuo wanted to cut off Shen Zechuan’s Hezhou, so Shen Zechuan would take away his Huaizhou. Huaizhou was close to Luoxia Pass, which was in turn close to the city of Quancheng, the native hometown of the Xue clan, the route of which formed an arc-shaped encirclement, just like the trade route between Huaizhou, Chazhou, and Cizhou.

Everyone, be it Xue Xiuzhuo or the emperor, had already exposed their weaknesses in the contention for supremacy. Had it been in the past, Shen Zechuan would definitely have nothing to worry about, but after Shao Chengbi's death, Fengquan was akin to a thorn stuck in the most inconspicuous of spots.

One that had already penetrated deep.

◇ CHAPTER 274: UNVEIL ◇

Note:

The titles in chapter 273, 274 – Reveal (显山), Unveil (露水) – are from the idiom “显山露水”. i.e., to reveal or flaunt one’s talents or the facts.

The Mengtuo Tribe’s territory was close to the forest of desert poplar trees. From a distance, they looked like they lived in an inextinguishable bonfire in the desert. The desert poplar was their symbol. This was where the tributary of the Chashi River lay. They occupied the only water source of Mosanchuan. Further east along was the hinterland of the desert, dominated by sweltering heat.

It was here Baya’er, an obese man who had grown himself a grizzled goatee, hosted a feast for Xiao Chiye. He personally poured wine for Xiao Chiye and said, “I’ve heard of the legend of the wolf. Your Armored Cavalry is just as cold and grim as the severe frost stampeding through the Chashi Sinkhole to crush Achi’s elite Scorpions.”

The open-air feast was bathed in moonlight. The nights of the desert were not at all black but a rich deep blue. Xiao Chiye sat here, different from the swift and brave men of Biansha. He had the wildness and frivolousness that hailed from Libei, one that was made all the more conspicuous after he removed his armor.

“Having received the Mengtuo Tribe’s praise,” Xiao Chiye said, “I’m willing to form an alliance with the tribe to become brothers who can rely on each other, just like the Huiyan Tribe.”

“In that case, why don’t we form a marriage alliance?” Baya’er looked at Xiao Chiye and sighed with emotions. “Hongyan Mountain produces fine men, and I know you people from Libei are all tough men. I really admire you, and my daughter truly wishes to marry you. If you are worried that your wife at home will not agree, then I am willing to give five hundred camels to this eldest madam.”

The women of the Twelve Tribes controlled the tribes’ supplies. In Baya’er’s view, if Xiao Chiye’s “wife” was a sensible person, then he should agree to this marriage and minimize the hassle imposed on his husband.

Far away in Dancheng, Shen Zechuan sneezed softly. Ji Gang, who was in the outer chamber holding the medicine in hand, shouted, “Chuan’er, take your medicine on time. This weather changes on a whim. If you are not careful, you’ll get a cough again.”

Xiao Chiye grasped the wine Baya’er toasted him. He had a great capacity for wine, drinking On Horseback in small sips on the way, and he was unbeatable back at home. But now, he seemed to be drunk and did not look as severe as he had been the last time he came to discuss with Baya’er.

Baya’er felt this to be an opportunity to exploit. He raised an arm to motion for Xiao Chiye to look to his right, where his youngest daughter, with her face covered with a thin layer of veil, sat with her head lowered as if she was shy. Confident that Dazhou had no girls like this, Baya’er said, “My Wuya is very loveable and well-behaved. She can take care of the eldest madam like a younger sister would.”

On hearing this, Lu Guangbai cast a glance at Xiao Chiye as he sliced the beef with a dagger. “Our Pref—Eldest Madam has no brothers at home, so I think it’s good if there is really a younger sister in the picture.”

Following along Baya’er’s arm, Xiao Chiye looked over, and the girl hung her head even lower.

Baya’er then said, “Wuya, come over and toast a cup of wine to the chief wolf.”

Wuya stood up. Intricate ornaments hung from her waist, tinkling as she walked, but Xiao Chiye’s mind was already wandering. He remembered that he had also hung a silver bell on Lanzhou’s ankle the one time he had taught Lanzhou a “lesson” while he was still in Dunzhou. It not only tinkled when it swung; there was also Lanzhou’s moist, disorderly panting.

Wuya had already come before Xiao Chiye. She had an exotic fragrance on her, and when she leaned over, she revealed her fair neck.

Lanzhou's neck was the most gorgeous drenched in the rain, soaking in the water, and immersed in sweat. Its arch was exquisite, tilting up and hanging down in tandem with his body that was being held captive... Xiao Chiye missed Shen Zechuan very much, and it was especially obvious at this one moment.

Wuya poured the wine to the brim and leaned over to offer it to Xiao Chiye. Her long lashes lifted, revealing her hatred when she looked at Xiao Chiye. The golden chain around her waist clattered as the young girl flipped out a dagger with her slender palm and, taking advantage of her movement as she made a toast, thrust it right at Xiao Chiye's throat.

Chen Yang had yet to react to the sudden turn of event so close at hand, but Gu Jin had already heard something amiss. He strode a step out and involuntarily blurted out, "Second Master—!"

The golden goblet smashed onto the tabletop with a "thud", splashing wine all over. Xiao Chiye did not even touch Wuya as he used his arm guard to parry the dagger. The next moment, the short table overturned, and Wuya went rolling. Her dagger that had already slipped from her hand landed between Xiao Chiye's palm. Before Baya'er could snap back to his senses, Xiao Chiye stood up and suddenly nailed the dagger onto Baya'er's table.

Nearly stabbed in the fingers, Baya'er was so startled that he turned pale from panic and fell paralyzed to his butt on the ground.

Xiao Chiye wiped the wine off his arm guard. His eyes sober as he said frostily, "I sincerely came here to befriend the Mengtuo Tribe, but the Mengtuo Tribe are hypocritical and malicious rats who spout honeyed words but hide swords behind their backs."

The generals at the feast all jolted to their feet. The three tiers of Armored Cavalry within and outside all flashed their blades with a "swoosh", filling the crimson desert polar forest with snow-white glints. The atmosphere took a sudden, hostile turn, and tension crackled in the air.

"No!" Baya'er did not expect Wuya to make such a rash assassination attempt. He hurriedly said, "This is by no means my intention. Please, chief wolf, do not be angry!" He clambered up and said resentfully as he stomped his foot at Wuya, "I raised you for over ten years, and yet you made such a grave mistake!"

Wuya's veil fell off. Propping herself up, she spat at Baya'er. "You betrayed the Hero and gave me to Hasen's mortal enemy. You are not worthy to be my father—"

Baya'er flew into a rage, and without waiting for Wuya to finish her words, he stepped forth to slap Wuya so hard that she fell to the ground. In the Biansha tongue, he snapped, "Hold her down!" Having said that, he turned around to plead with Xiao Chiye. "She has been bewitched by Amu'er and has long since lost her mind. She cannot be considered to be my daughter. I'm willing to kill her for the chief wolf. Please do not take it out on the Mengtuo Tribe!"

Xiao Chiye's expression did not change in the slightest.

The Libei Armored Cavalry surrounded the Mengtuo Tribe. Baya'er's elites were all on the periphery. If they were to really start fighting, whatever little people he had would not be able to stop the assault of the completely geared-up Armored Cavalry at all. Baya'er was no longer in the position to negotiate further. All he could do was to draw out the saber of the guard beside him and raise it high against Wuya.

The silvery moon hung high in the sky, where a saker falcon of Mosanchuan circled alone. The towering branches of the desert poplar cut into the moon at an oblique angle, while the wind fluttered the Libei's wolf banner. Baya'er held the saber up, unable to bring himself to strike. His goatee trembled for a moment, and under the sound of Wuya's sobs, he flung down the saber and turned around to fall to his knees before Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye secured his arm guard tightly. Behind him, Chen Yang came over to put his overcoat on for him. Xiao Chiye lowered his eyes to look at Baya'er, his hand on Langli Blade beside his waist.

"I only have this one daughter left." Tears streamed down Baya'er's aged face. "I wanted to betroth her to the powerful Libei King of Wolves because our Mengtuo Tribe is always getting plundered by the other tribes all year round. Amu'er is already old. Who can ensure our survival..."

"Take back your five hundred camels." Xiao Chiye turned around to leave. "Save them for the Mengtuo Tribe's own mutual trade market use."

Xiao Chiye walked a few steps, then turned his head aside to look at Wuya. The night breeze swayed the little braid that had fallen to the side of Xiao Chiye's shoulder. He raised his hand to draw out the dagger and tossed it before Wuya.

“You are the one who handed me the lives of the entire Mengtuo Tribe on a silver platter tonight.”

Wuya’s face turned ghastly white. The exotic fragrance on her had all dissipated. She covered her face and wept.

Baya’er prostrated over the ground and shouted, “The Mengtuo Tribe is willing to follow the King of Wolves to reign in the desert...”

Xiao Chiye whistled, and Meng landed on his shoulder. He looked in front, where the entrance to Mosanchuan was already open. The narrow path that was paved with moonlight led to his destination. Behind him, the wolf banner of Libei replaced the eagle banner of the desert.

“How did you guess Wuya was going to assassinate you?” Lu Guangbai asked as he left with Xiao Chiye.

“You said Baya’er wanted to marry her to Hasen.” Xiao Chiye flipped onto the horse. As he pulled the reins of the horse, he paused for a moment. “My guess was that it was Wuya’s own wish. Baya’er wanted so badly to marry her to me because she no longer had eyes for the boys in this desert and considered them beneath her notice.”

“I even suspected that you were intoxicated.” Lu Guangbai followed suit and got on his own horse. “Gege was on tenterhooks, fearing that you would lose your head. Say, when I return and face His Lordship, should I speak without reservation, or should I feign ignorance?”

“I won’t lose my head.” Who else was there in this world who could ever compare to Shen Lanzhou? Xiao Chiye turned his horse around, letting the wind dissipate the heat and diminishing the effect of the wine. He looked at Lu Guangbai and said solemnly, “The wine and scent don’t work on me. I’m sober.”

Lu Guangbai saw him looking all serious and thorough in everything he did, so he believed it to be true. How was he to know that Xiao Chiye had his head full of immodest thoughts about Shen Lanzhou earlier?

Xiao Chiye changed the subject. “With the Mengtuo Tribe remaining here now, there’s only the Hulu Tribe left to the east of Mosanchuan to supply Amu’er with grains. Duo’erlan brought back the remaining warriors of the Youxiong Tribe for Amu’er, which shows that Amu’er doesn’t have many elites left.”

Huhelu, Achi, Zhuoli, and Hasen—Amu’er’s vanguard, raider, guard, and general were all killed in battle, and the six tribes in his hands were all on edge after Xiao Chiye began his advance east. The Mengtuo Tribe was now willing to enter an alliance in order to preserve their lives, and Amu'er's golden tent<sup>124</sup> happened to be smack right in the hinterland of the desert.

Xiao Chiye wanted the victor to be determined in one battle.

After Hasen's death, the Biansha withdrew its troops. Going by Dazhou's conventional practice, they would not pursue beyond the Chashi River's line of defense. But to Xiao Chiye, the lives of the others could perhaps be spared, but not Amu'er's.

As the man in the desert who nearly became the Great Ruler of the Twelve Tribes. Amu'er was a formidable and ambitious man who could fight for supremacy with Xiao Fangxu. What made him more dangerous than Hasen was that he also had the political means. He not only wanted to fight victorious battles—that was something he delegated to the others. He spent twenty years painstakingly bringing about the collapse of a dynasty. As long as he was given the opportunity to catch his breath and survive, he would have new plans, and his methods would only become more sophisticated and tough to detect.

This man must die, or Xiao Chiye would not sleep easy at night.

Amu'er perched on his throne. His golden tent did not have the curtains closed, and the moonlight shone through the gap to illuminate the ground at his feet. He sat alone, gazing at the rolling sand dunes under the moon.

"Many years ago," Amu'er said in a quiet voice. "I once led my troops deep into the enemy's territory and met Xiao Fangxu at the foot of the Hongyan Mountains. At that time, he was still a nameless junior soldier. I regarded him as a lifelong adversary. I won against him many times before, and I've also lost to him many times."

The aged wise man who had prayed for Hasen sat in the corner of Amu'er's golden tent and dropped the withered branch in his hand onto the blanket before his knees. In a trembling voice, he slowly said, "You defeated him."

In the glow of the moonlight, Amu'er closed his eyes. There was no sign of his age to be seen on this face of his, and he looked so dignified that it was as if he had just ascended to the throne. He said, "It was my son who killed him."

“His son killed your son.” The wise man gasped laboriously as he prostrated over the woolen blanket. After spending a moment to catch his breath, he pushed again all those withered branches. “But you still have a grandson. Duo’erlan will bear Hasen a healthy and strong child. We have not lost this battle.”

Amu’er held on to the armrests of his throne, looking like a beast trapped here. His eyes moved, and eventually, he opened them to look at the unchanging sand dunes. “You told me the same thing too when I dispatched troops to Luoxia Pass. We walked out of the desert, looking for land we could live and survive on. But all these years, the battles have not stopped, and the number of deaths has increased. Dazhou is like a tree that has already decayed, but the favor of the heavenly god has yet to tilt towards us. Libei lost Xiao Fangxu, but very quickly, they obtained a new King of Wolves. I hear him pounding his battle drums as he walks towards my golden tent. He is far younger and stronger than Xiao Fangxu.”

“You are the last morning light the god bestowed upon the desert,” the wise man said staunchly as he grasped up those withered branches. “I shall watch you leave this wolf far behind in the dust.”

Amu’er left his throne. He stood up, following the trail of the moon as he said, “It’s time to get the Scorpions to move.”

The clothes and hat official secured the cotton-padded coat and hat for Fengquan and took down a piece of prepared paper from the assembled bamboo. Fengquan wiped his hand with the paper and listened as the other person spoke.

The clothes and hat official moved deftly, partially concealed in the darkness as he said, “Zhongbo must be defeated before the gate of Qudu. It’s only by killing Shen Zechuan and allowing the dynasty to continue lingering on the verge of death can the sun far in the east rise as usual.”

“Shen Zechuan has repeatedly been through danger many times in Dunzhou and Duanzhou.” Fengquan watched the clothes and hat official hung the clothes up to scent<sup>125</sup> and said quietly, “You people have had countless opportunities to kill him, but you didn’t do so.”

“He is far tougher than expected.” The clothes and hat official put away the shoes<sup>126</sup> for Fengquan. He was on his knees on the ground, but he raised his eyes to stare at Fengquan as he said, “You knew that already.”

Fengquan bent over and enunciated, word for word, "You people are the useless ones."

The candle of the lamp burned quietly as momentary silence descended upon the duty room.

"I already said two years back not to act presumptuously, but you people still spread the epidemic into Qudu and gave Shen Zechuan the opportunity to be promoted." Fengquan's voice was gloomy. "Amu'er thinks he has the whole picture in sight, but in truth, he can't see a thing."

The clothes and hat official suddenly straightened up and raised a hand to slap Fengquan on the leg, holding a long, thin earpick in his palm. That sharp, unexpected object pressed against Fengquan's leg, making it clear that it could also deal a fatal blow when the time called for it.

"Calm down." The clothes and hat official had pupils that leaned towards brown. "That epidemic also gave Mu Ru the opportunity... Xue Xiuzhuo trusts you so much precisely because you were able to show your loyalty at that time. You are already standing in the center right now, and the emperor of Dazhou is well within your reach. After this battle, you will be free."

Fengquan's overly cold and detached eyes looked at the clothes and hat official, not believing a single word of his lie. Ever since the day he left Qudu, he had been loaded into a box, destined to never escape for the rest of his life.

"Your foolish father is dead. You originally could have stopped him, but you didn't." The clothes and hat official kept away the earpick. "I didn't tell anyone about this... Do you understand?"

Fengquan's pale face looked a little sickly in the shadow of the lamp. "He wasn't a Scorpion. No one could manipulate him. He had long gone crazy, willing as he was to die for others. I was merely sending him on his way."

"You let him take away the firearms."

"Since he wanted to die," Fengquan's eyelids suddenly twitched, but without a change in his expression, he brushed aside the clothes and hat official's hand and continued, "then giving him that batch of fake goods worked out just fine, didn't it?"

"You're right. Shao Chengbi was a lunatic. He kept vigil at Zhaozui Temple day and night, and burned incense at home to pray to Buddha to beg for forgiveness. To let him die is to fulfill his wish. You are a filial son.”

The clothes and hat official tidied up his robe and stood up.

“Time for you to take your medicine.”

Credit: Thank you daisiesfordaze and Yen for spotting the typo! <3

◇ CHAPTER 275: GAMBIT ◇

Qudu in the eleventh month was met with an unbroken spell of wet weather. Defensive weapons were set up everywhere on all sides of the city walls. The Capital Command Troops did not mingle together with the motley crew of soldiers Luo Mu brought along from Chazhou. Everyone was clearly separated, like the waters of the Jing and Wei Rivers.

When Luo Mu returned to Qudu, he was no longer the obsequious and servile man he once was a few years ago. Qudu was now depending on him for support, and when he entered the city, Chen Zhen personally came to receive him. He changed into a brand new official robe and stood atop the city wall with Chen Zhen to look out into the distance where Dancheng was.

“The rest of the seven cities’ garrison troops are being transferred back to Qudu and will be here in the next few days. We can gather 50,000 soldiers in total for you.” Chen Zhen braced himself against the battlement, exhaling cold air in between breaths. “The armory of the Capital Command Troops will be made available to you too. Defend for as long as you can.”

Luo Mu was a civil official, but when he headed down to Chazhou, it was to reorganize armaments and combat banditry, so he was no stranger to military affairs. Holding up his umbrella, he said, “Shen Zechuan is not a man given to fighting wars. He defended Duanzhou only because he was compelled by circumstances and had no choice but to guard it. He now has only 20,000 Dunzhou Garrison Troops. It will be tough for him to breach Qudu even if he wants to.”

Qudu had sealed off the city gate to the east. The commoners who fled from Dancheng were all gathered at the entrance. While Chen Zhen and Luo Mu spoke, they looked down at the foot of the city, which was packed with refugees.

“There’s one thing I will have to ask Your Excellency the Minister to report to Her Majesty.” Luo Mu pointed to the refugees. “Shen Zechuan has the habit of buying the hearts of the people. If these refugees cannot enter the city and find a place to settle down, then once the snow falls, he will think of a way to win them over to his side, then make use of the opportunity to spread the word and blow the matter out of proportion. I fear that will only be detrimental to the imperial court.”

Cai Yu lost to Shen Zechuan in Chazhou precisely because of the word “benevolence”. Those who rescued another from extreme misery would be the said person’s great benefactor, like a second set of parents who have given them a new lease of life. Shen Zechuan could even clear himself of the charge of Shen Wei’s troop defeat, so why not they follow suit? At present, there were still rumors in Juexi about Shen Zechuan’s aid relief to Yongcheng. If Qudu could not turn the tables before winter came around, they would be the first to lose out even before they started fighting.

“In your opinion,” Chen Zhen looked at Luo Mu, “what should we do? Qudu is already overcrowded. There are even people sleeping in the public ditches on Donglong Street. If we take in any more refugees, we will be breaking the regulations of the yamen in Qudu. The granary can’t afford to feed them too.”

“Take in the refugees for our own use,” Luo Mu said. “I see that most of them are in the prime of their lives. Why not enlist them into the army to serve the state? As long as they can make Zhongbo suffer a crushing defeat, there won’t be a lack of rewards from the imperial court in the future. What is this bit of grain today? There will somehow be enough to go around if we scrimp on it.”

Luo Mu dared to say this because he had also “borrowed” grains when he transited through Hezhou.

“Look, Your Excellency,” Luo Mu raised his hand and pointed it out for Chen Zhen. “Cizhou is one of Shen Zechuan’s strategic points. He established a large granary on the trade route between Huaizhou, Cizhou, and Chazhou, which allows him to supply to the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path to the north and provide relief aids for Chazhou’s natural disasters to the south. If we can wrest Cizhou from his control, it will only prove to be beneficial to us. Shen Zechuan's mobilization of troops to Dancheng has already stirred panic and unease among the groups of cities in the west. He has to take a breather at this moment; he can't act rashly. But we are different. We can send troops whenever we want to suppress the rebellion and crush the rebels. All we lack is the opportunity to fight him."

Chen Zhen looked at Luo Mu and said, "This opportunity is a tough one to seek."

"On the contrary, it's not difficult. Shen Zechuan is Shen Wei's son, after all. He enters Qudu with his eyes on the throne. If he succeeds, the condemned sinner of all time, Shen Wei, will be enshrined and worshiped in the Imperial Ancestral Temple." Luo Mu looked back at Chen Zhen and smiled, "Who would agree to this?"

"Persuasion?" Li Jianting looked back. "It is wartime now. If something untoward were to happen should we send the students out there, I'll see how you intend to answer for that."

"Your Majesty," Luo Mu prostrated himself against the wool carpet. "Shen Zechuan is shrewd and sophisticated. He is certain to round them up first and persuade them after to win over the hearts of the people. If we just sit still and resign ourselves to fate, I fear that situation may devolve rapidly. It will be difficult to ensure that nothing goes wrong then. Furthermore, Jiang Wanxiao's soliciting of Qidong's support also hinges on the way the wind blows in Qudu. As such, this humble subject deems it necessary for a war of words to be waged at this moment."

Luo Mu did not speak bluntly. With the passage of time, it was gradually becoming more and more difficult to convince the people regarding Li Jianting's lineage. If they continued to drag it on any further, by the time Gao Zhongxiong regained his strength to deal another blow, it would be difficult to win back the hearts of the people of Dancheng whom Shen Zechuan had mollified.

"Your Majesty, we have already lost the opportunity to take the lead in the Dancheng battle," Chen Zhen advised too. "If we can win back a game without using a single soldier, it will be beneficial for Qudu's present morale."

"We ought to unite against a common foe before a formidable enemy," Kong Qiu said after contemplating it. "If we can unite the hearts of the common folks in the south and west, it won't be tough to defend this winter."

Li Jianting said, "It's widely said in Qudu that Shen Zechuan is a narrow-minded person, and that is, in fact, a rumor. The way I see him act in Dancheng is unhurried and composed. I fear it'd be hard if all of you are thinking of forcing him into deploying troops with your eloquence."

"This is not a trap targeted at Shen Zechuan," Luo Mu composed himself and raised his head, "but Yao Wenyu."

Yao Wenyu was Shen Zechuan's strategist. Not only did he call forth the wise talents of the world for Shen Zechuan, he also played a pivotal role in implementing the census register in the six prefectures. What's even rarer was that he advised Shen Zechuan to take in the former ministers of Qudu. Gao Zhongxiong and the others could escape the fate of being buried talents in exile all thanks to Yao Wenyu's wisdom. Without Yao Wenyu, Shen Zechuan's Zhongbo officials would not have expanded to such proportions.

Kong Qiu and Cen Yu had both been taught by Hai Liangyi. Hearing Luo Mu mention Yao Wenyu now, they could not help but turn aside. Unable to hold back his appreciation for talents, Cen Yu said, "I... hear Yuanzhuo has been in ill-health ever since arriving in Zhongbo. If so..."

"His Excellency Cen is right!" Luo Mu said. "We'll line up the scholars at the foot of the city to persuade them to surrender. If Yao Wenyu doesn't dare to come, Zhongbo's morale would definitely plummet, and Shen Zechuan will only be worthy of being a cowering coward. But if Yao Wenyu dares to come, returning to his former hometown will definitely kill his arrogance!"

Cen Yu jerked to his feet and pointed at Luo Mu as he blurted, "You're truly—"

Truly vicious!

Yao Wenyu was incurably ill, and both of his legs were broken. By demanding him to make his way to the foot of the city wall to respond, Luo Mu meant for him to face his former acquaintances in Qudu, as well as to show the world the way he looked dragging out a feeble existence—look, two years ago, this man was still the Unpolished Jade renowned to all in the world!

"As long as we can deal a blow to Yao Wenyu," Luo Mu kowtowed deeply, "Shen Zechuan will no doubt take a battering."

He did not finish his words. The students would be unarmed when they faced up against an array of tens of thousands of troops. If Yao Wenyu were no match for the students, he would incur the indignation of the garrison troops. Weapons had no eyes on the battlefield. The Dunzhou Garrison Troops only had to injure the students, and Shen Zechuan's virtuous reputation would go up in smoke.

Li Jianting looked at Luo Mu. This person devised such a vicious trap to score a victory; he could already be said to be ungrateful and cold-hearted,

Fengquan quietly cast a sidelong glance at Xue Xiuzhuo, who was hidden at the very back. Not a moment later, as he expected, Luo Mu said, "His Excellency Xue has a prestigious reputation among the students, and he studied in the same academy under the same teacher as Yao Wenyu. This humble subject thinks that His Excellency should take it upon himself for this gambit."

Xue Xiuzhuo stood up silently and said, "Since Yao Wenyu could assist Shen Zechuan with his broken legs and flailing body, he is no longer the distinguished young master of intellectual discourses of the past. By setting this trap, you merely want the whole world to watch fellow pupils kill each other." He looked at Li Jianting. "I will not agree."

Fengquan pursed his lips into a smile as he poured the tea.

Li Jianting gazed at Xue Xiuzhuo with an odd expression in her eyes in that brief moment of silence. She said, as if in reassurance, "Of course. I can't bear to subject Teacher to such hardship too. There is still no news from Jiang Wanxiao, so let the Grand Secretariat choose the students to go this time."

Raindrops pounded on the eaves, that pattering of rain giving prompt to something else.

"Where exactly are you from?"

This was what Li Jianting asked Fengquan that night.

Kneeling in the fathomless dark shadows, Fengquan replied, "This humble slave was originally the descendant of an official in Jincheng. The official convicted of a crime, Shao Chengbi, was my maternal uncle. Back then, this humble slave's mother was implicated and sent into exile to Zhongbo, where this humble slave was born. His Excellency Yanqing later went looking all over for former officials and saved this humble slave from extreme misery and brought me back to Qudu." He raised his head and said in a timid and helpless tone, “This humble slave and my uncle are as close as father and son, so I was willing to enter the palace for my uncle’s case of injustice. Under the personal guidance of His Excellency Yanqing, I’ve served two emperors and one empress dowager in the palace... until Your Majesty, who is the most prudent.”

Xiande, Tiancheng, the Empress Dowager—all of them died in the struggle for power. Of them, the death of Emperor Tianchen, Li Jianheng, was the fishiest. Mu Ru’s assassination attempt was no secret in the Xue’s residence. To date, Xue Xiuzhuo was unwilling to replace Fengquan and still wanted to use him to serve Li Jianting.

“You report all the trifles in my daily life to him.” Li Jianting leaned over. “Is Xue Yanqing keeping an eye on me because he fears I won’t do a good job as an emperor?”

Fengquan did not dare to answer.

Li Jianting stared at him for a long time, then said, “Was Mu Ru’s assassination of Li Jianheng on Han Cheng’s or Xue Xiuzhuo’s order?”

Fengquan wanted to avoid Li Jianting’s gaze, but Li Jianting suddenly grasped of Fengquan’s chin. As she pressed in closer, she said, “He has been watching me ever since I entered the palace...” Li Jianting suddenly laughed and said mockingly, “No wonder he dared to be the minister who stands alone. The life of the emperor lies in his hands.”

Xue Xiuzhuo would not begrudge it.

He could even bear to sacrifice himself. Naturally, he could also bear to sacrifice others.

“Shao Chengbi wants to overturn the verdict for the old case,” Li Jianting released Fengquan and said coldly, “Only I can do that.”

Qi Shiyu lay on the bed, looking as if he could not weather being worn down by both illness and anger. His hair had turned several shades whiter. There was already no sign of the suaveness he once possessed when he spurred his horse through Qudu and bowled over women. Saliva trickled down the side of his lips. Qi Zhuyin wiped it off with a handkerchief.

“Jiang,” Qi Shiyu gasped as he spoke, “Jiang Wanxiao is going to arrive, arrive soon. Discuss, with him. We will send troops to, to Qudu.”

Qi Zhuyin rolled up her sleeves to reveal her arms. Washing the handkerchief in the copper basin by the bed, she said, “We’ll see.”

Qi Shiyu's chest heaved. Swiveling his eyes, he said, "When you win merit for, for protecting the emperor, you, you will be the reign of Shengyin's..."

"Two borders and three prefectures have already risen in revolt." Qi Zhuyin conscientiously washed the handkerchief. "How long can Emperor Shengyin still remain sitting on her throne? With that 10,000 Capital Command Troops of hers, she can't even step out of Qudu's main gate."

"Qi Zhu, Zhuyin!" Qi Shiyu raised his voice abruptly. "Unfilial daughter!"

Qi Zhuyin wrung the handkerchief and said nothing.

Qi Shiyu's tears soaked his temples. His lips quivered, and he choked with sobs, "You ruined, ruined the Qi clan. In the future, you won't even, even be able to be laid to rest in the ancestral graveyard,"

The setting sun at the window shone upon Qi Zhuyin's back as she focused on drying the handkerchief, looking as if she had not heard him.

"If Shen, Shen Zechuan fails," Qi Shiyu shed tears of bitterness, "Can you alone make up for the entire Qi clan? Everyone in the world will hate, hate you. You forged my, my oral message. Oh, you..."

Qi Zhuyin smoothed out her handkerchief and turned her head aside under the scattered shadows of the window lattice to gaze upon those overlapping flowers and plants. After a moment's silence, she said, "If Shen Zechuan fails, report to Qudu how I forged the message and coerced my elder brother of common birth to write it on my behalf. Kong Boran is an intelligent man. He would rather kill me alone to ensure your survival."

Qi Shiyu's message to Qudu was fake. That was something Qi Zhuyin forced her older brother of common birth with her blade to write. But was there nothing Qi Shiyu could do? He was tacitly giving his consent, wanting to leave the Qi clan with a way out. If Shen Zechuan were to suffer a defeat. Qi Shiyu would rather hand over Qi Zhuyin in exchange for the lives of the entire clan.

At that very moment Qi Zhuyin decided not to send troops, she ceased to be a daughter of the Qi clan. The freedom Qi Shiyu gave was limited to the Qi clan. If Qi Zhuyin could no longer seek honor and glory for the Qi clan, she was no different from those good-for-nothing brothers of common birth of hers.

Qi Zhuyin did not stay for long. She hung out the handkerchief to dry and withdrew from the room. Several brothers of common birth were waiting under the eaves. None of them dare to raise their heads to look at her. She took Zhujiu Qi Wei handed her and turned a blind eye to them too.

Qi Wei followed Qi Zhuyin out of the courtyard and whispered, "His Excellency Jiang should be here by now."

"Is the Eldest Madam ready?" Qi Zhuyin asked.

Qi Wei opened his mouth but did not speak. Qi Zhuyin followed his gaze and turned her head to see Hongying lift the screen and Hua Xiangyi carrying the hem of her skirt as she got off the sedan. She did not know either where she got the idea to move past Hongying and offer her arm to Hua Xiangyi.

The delicate fragrance of Hua Xiangyi's white flower greeted her. Hua Xiangyi set a slender palm on her shoulder. It was only after she landed on the ground that she belatedly realized it was Qi Zhuyin.

Qi Zhuyin wanted to say a little something, so she offhandedly said, "Yo..." Having been a little fatigued lately, she looked at Hua Xiangyi and continued, "the flower is quite pretty."

Hongying, who was at the side, covered her lips and gave a small cough. Hua Xiangyi's pink cheeks blushed a little. She loosened her grip, initially meaning to shift her hand away, but for some reason, she changed her mind and left it on Qi Zhuyin as she said, "The tea pavilion is ready. Invite Wanxiao over later to rest his feet there. There is a screen erected in the middle. Wanxiao's wife can take a short break here, and we can also let Jiran take a look at her."

"You are the madam, so naturally, I'll leave the arrangements at your discretion," Qi Zhuyin said. "Jiang Qingshan is an eloquent speaker in Juexi, so it's better if you aren't on the losing end when discussing it over with him. No matter what, military power is still in my hand, so even if he has a glib tongue, he won't be able to save Qudu, not unless he kills me."

The upturned tip<sup>127</sup> of Hua Xiangyi's embroidered shoes peeked out a little. She smoothed the pleats of her skirt and said to Qi Zhuyin with a smile. "I have a way."

Shen Zechuan grabbed up a handful of the surplus grain from Dancheng and looked at the furnishings in the granary. "The granary has been in disrepair for years. Winter is right around the corner, and it has been overcast and rainy for days on end. We can't continue to keep the grains here as they will turn damp and moldy."

Fei Sheng closed the oil paper umbrella and answered, "The advisors have the same intent too, but it's not a good time now. Master, if we were to move the grains without careful consideration and raise the suspicions of the commoners in the city, all our efforts these days will be wasted."

The Dunzhou Garrison Troops had been stationed here for less than half a month, eating and sleeping with more reserve than they had been outside the city. Fortunately, Shen Zechuan had ample grains, so the soldiers did not have to go hungry. Although there was some private resentment at the bottom ranks, there were no incidents. Many of the common people of Dancheng had fled west, and in doing so, they blocked Shen Zechuan from moving ahead.

"There aren't many grains left." Yao Wenyu's wheelchair, which was wet with water, left marks behind as he moved it. "The winter is bitterly cold, and Dancheng still has to provide aid relief despite lacking grains. Rather than transferring it again from Cizhou when the time calls for it, why not Your Lordship distribute the grains locally?"

The grains in Dancheng were all grains the Pan clan had left. It was inevitably too much of a trouble to transfer grains with the grain wagons again. Distributing grains locally onsite could not only allay the commoners' fears, but also save a batch of relief grains for the winter. Zhongbo's grain reserves were limited. If Qudu could only be besieged but not attacked, then all both parties could compete on was endurance.

"Jiang Wanxiao headed for Qidong. Using this as a reason, Luo Mu urged the Yan clan to deliberate it over again and really managed to convince them. Several days ago, the grains from several cities were delivered to Qudu, where the military drill ground at Mount Feng has already been converted into storage for grains. The waterway to the south can lead directly to Hezhou. Master, Qudu meant to fight a protracted war with us."

"They call it a protracted war, but they are still waiting for Jiang Qingshan." Shen Zechuan let go of the grains. "The Qidong Garrison Troops is Qudu's lifeline. The Grand Secretariat and Xue Yanqing both know that they can't stop us with just a motley crew of 50,000 soldiers. They are staking it all on a single throw by stockpiling grains."

Yao Wenyu made to speak, but then covered his mouth and coughed.

"There's wind leaking into the granary," Shen Zechuan said. "Fei Sheng, give my overcoat to Yuanzhuo."

“Master can’t withstand this cold wind either.” Fei Sheng motioned for the guard at the door to hand over the clothing. “Qiao Tianya anticipated that Mister would forget to bring his overcoat and so went to the special effort of sending someone to bring the overcoat over when we were just about to set off. I’ve been waiting for Mister to ask.”

Even covered with the overcoat, Yao Wenyu’s coughs did not subside. No one brought up the issue of seeing a physician again before him now. Although he took his medicines on time, one could visibly see Yuanzhuo gradually grow wan and sallow.

“Jiang Wanxiao has arrived at Qidong...” Yao Wenyu was midway through speaking when there was a commotion outside the granary.

Tantai Hu entered with his blade over his shoulder, bowed to Shen Zechuan, and reported in a gruff voice, “Your Lordship, a messenger has arrived from Qudu, saying that they want to discuss with us as they could not bear to see the people plunged into an abyss of misery. Those dozens of students have been sent out of the city gates and are now waiting at the erected platform west of Dancheng. Your Lordship, at this moment, we are strong, and the enemy is weak, so what’s there to discuss further? Might as well get Shenwei to write a declaration of war, and we can attack our way into Qudu and save ourselves the trouble!”

Wiping his palm, Shen Zechuan asked, “Who are among those who came?”

“Cen Xunyi is taking the lead. The rest are all students.”

Shen Zechuan only had to think for a moment to know of the dangers involved.

“Jiang Wanxiao has already arrived at Qidong, and the Eldest Madam has to have a long talk with him. If we do not agree now, we will inevitably be looked down upon by Qidong. Further, a prolonged siege of Qudu is never the best policy.” Yao Wenyu held up his handkerchief and turned his head aside to say to Shen Zechuan. “The opportunity has presented itself. Your Lordship, I’ll be right back.”

The sun shone brightly in Qidong. Smoke rose from the tea pavilion.

Hua Xiangyi sat in a dignified manner across the tea table and served tea with cleaned hands.

Qi Zhuyin gestured for Jiang Qingshan to sit. “You have come a long way. This is a reception feast, so there’s no need to be nervous. Just take a seat.”

The travel-worn Qingshan had just changed his clothes at the side hall earlier. He did not stand on ceremony as he sat with his sleeves held together. With a smile, he said, “It is my undeserving honor to be able to drink a cup of tea brewed by Third Missy.”

He addressed Hua Xiangyi as Third Missy, her old address, which meant that he did not regard Hua Xiangyi as the Eldest Madam of Qidong, but as the former master of Dicheng. That word, clearly distant and estranged, made it clear that he had no wish to discuss with Hua Xiangyi.

Hua Xiangyi held the tea and said in a soft voice, “The journey is tiring, and Madam is pregnant. It’s indeed inadvisable to stay at the relay station. I’ve got someone to clean up a courtyard earlier. If you don’t mind it, you can stay here at home.”

Her “home” was the Qi residence, and she was in charge of all the inner courtyard’s affairs. No matter what Jiang Qingshan called her, she was the Lady of the Qi clan’s house.

Jiang Qingshan sipped the tea, thereby kicking off their first exchange.

It was raining heavily in Dancheng. The sougning of the bamboo rose and fell.

Apprehensive, Cen Yu was on the high platform when he suddenly heard the sound of the flute entering the waves of bamboo. He let loose a soft exclamation of “ah” and watched as an oil paper made its way over in the rain along with the trickling streams of water.

A boundary line separated both armies, and Yao Wenyu did not continue to advance. The white donkey under the umbrella trod upon the water leisurely. The hem of Yao Wenyu’s green robe draped down over both sides of the donkey’s belly, while the zhaowen bag around his waist was still the same as before. Amidst the rain and fog around him, he looked no different from he did in the past.

“I left Qudu in such a hurry back then and did not manage to bid farewell to you.” Yao Wenyu leaned down to make a bow on the back of the donkey, “So here I am now, upon hearing of your invitation today.”

Seeing Yao Wenyu bow from the back of the donkey, Cen Yu knew the rumors were true—those legs of his had really been broken. A multitude of emotions welled up in him as he stood where he was with his ears buzzing.

All he could do was sigh with grief, “You... why subject yourself to such misery?!”

Credits: Thank you fukixie for pointing out the typos! <3

◇ CHAPTER 276: CONFRONTATION IN THE RAIN ◇

Why, indeed.

Yao Wenyu did not have an answer to that. He did not come today to answer the question of why he was subjecting himself to this “misery”. He knew what Qudu’s intention was by doing this. Everyone in the world was looking at him, their admiration morphed into compassion. They would rather look down upon him from above and pity him, as if without this pair of legs, he lost the courage to stand before the people.

Living was far harder than dying.

Long when Yao Wenyu had laid down, he already clearly understood his life going forward. This was not the first time he had received such gazes, nor would it be the last. As long as he still existed in the world, he would forever have to face these pitying. It was an agony he could not share with anyone else—anyone.

The oil umbrella formed a curtain of rain to conceal the green robe within. Yao Wenyu was so far away he seemed to be sitting among the clouds. Even when he fell, he was still clean and untainted.

“There is one state in life toughest to achieve.” Shen Zechuan stood far away in the watchtower and said to Qiao Tianya beside him, “and that is, delighted not by external gains, and saddened not by personal losses.<sup>128</sup> If a person can be so sanguine to such an extent, he will not be far from enlightenment. When I first met him, I thought he was this kind of person, but later, I realized it was not the case at all.”

To attain enlightenment was to be devoid of feelings—to be merciless to oneself.

Yao Wenyu could not. He had the masses in his heart. He also had him in his heart. He seemed to be a supermundane wanderer of the mortal world, far removed from the secular realm, spending his previous twenty years riding a donkey with all the carefreeness in the world. That was living vicariously, and it was not wrong.

Qiao Tianya looked into the distance at that smear of green, as if he was looking at the emerald willows and jade bamboo on the horizon. He set down his flute and picked up the wine to take a sip, then answered, as if intoxicated, “I understand him.”

The rain continued to fall.

Yao Wenyu’s voice was as clear and melodious as jade as he said, “There’s no need for you to worry on my behalf for now. Qudu seems to be a trapped beast, one that exhausts the strength of the seven cities to battle to the death with our Prefectural Lord. This is an unwise strategy not worth adopting.”

“If Shen Zechuan has the intent, he ought to have long surrendered and not established himself as ‘lord’. You people mass deploy troops to Dancheng to intimidate Qudu, throwing the commoners in the world into a state of panic and unease.” Cen Yu was here today to induce them to surrender. He could not hold himself back from taking a step out now to say across the misty rain, “If Yuanzhuo is willing to persuade him to surrender today, I am willing to vouch for him with my own head just for his benevolent deeds in the six prefectures of Zhongbo.”

“The situation at present is clear cut, and the outcome is a foregone conclusion. So why deceive yourself and the others any further?” Yao Wenyu said. “In order to keep the commoners in the city from having this catastrophe unleashed upon them, His Lordship stayed put in Dancheng and refused to advance. In truth, the 120,000 Garrison Troops of Zhongbo are already prepared and raring to go; besieging Qudu will only take a short time. As they say, besiege not the walled cities, if it can possibly be avoided.<sup>129</sup> If the emperor is willing to open the gates and surrender for the sake of the commoners in the city, I am also willing to vouch for her with my own head.”

“You and I are former acquaintances, so why make such boasts to me? There are merely 20,000 soldiers in Zhongbo available for use. Shen Zechuan is already showing signs of exhaustion cooling his heels guarding the Cizhou granary. Chazhou and Hezhou have now surrendered and pledged allegiance to us. Evidently, he has lost the hearts of the people and cannot establish trust among them. Qudu now has the assistance of the seven cities, and there's also Qidong serving as a shield. The 300,000 Qidong Garrison Troops are the real thing. Shen Zechuan wants to obtain the Li clan's empire, but no one will possibly yield. You attacked your way into Dancheng, causing the rise of refugees everywhere." Cen Yu pointed at Qudu. "All the people before the gate of Qudu are refugees who have fled there. You can hear infants wailing at night and see widowed mothers selling their daughters during the day. If you people are really a benevolent army, how can you turn a blind eye to all these?"

Yao Wenyu did not answer.

A student beside Cen Yu bowed to Yao Wenyu and cleared his throat to speak, "Not only that, Shen Zechuan rebelled for no reason and brought calamity upon Qudu. Even if he can breach the city with a strong army, he will be hard-pressed to win the public over with the same army. The present emperor is rightfully legitimate and is the only candidate to be the Son of Heaven. The confrontation of two armies will result in countless casualties. So why not bury the hatchet today? As long as everyone from Zhongbo can surrender in all sincerity, Her Majesty, bless her wise and virtuous heart, will surely not pursue the grave offense."

They made it all out to sound so pleasant, but the consequence of disarming themselves to surrender was something that even Kong Qiu himself could not guarantee, let alone Cen Yu.

Yao Wenyu was about to speak when the wind came assailing in the rain, leaving him with no option but to temporarily cover his mouth and cough softly.

Cen Yu did not have the heart to watch, but the student beside him thought they had gained the upper hand. Seeing how frail Yuanzhuo was, he could not refrain from taking another step forth and shooting his mouth off animatedly, "I know 'Unpolished Jade Yuanzhuo' always has the fine reputation of being unrivaled in Qudu, and I also know that you were born of the Yao clan and studied under the Secretariat Elder. How lamentable that you failed to live up to your talent and learning. Instead, you devote yourself to serving the Shen clan and turning your back on the will of the forefathers! Yao Yuanzhuo, an old hero still holds high aspirations just like an old steed still aspires to gallop a thousand li if it could, and yet all you can do is submit to a rebel. I lament the waste of your talents and, even more so, lament the Secretariat Elder for entrusting his legacy to the wrong person. Your sickly and feeble body of today is a far cry from the dashing and spirited presence you once cut, but even so, I'd still wish to advise you to realize the error of your ways and turn back from the path that has led you astray!"

Raindrops landed on the railings, soaking Shen Zechuan's sleeves and robes. He held the folding fan between his sleeves to prevent the rain from getting on it. He looked at the green bamboo from the watchtower, where Yao Wenyu was already partially concealed.

When Shen Zechuan was still in Qudu, he once said to Xiao Chiye that if he were given a choice, he would rather choose Xue Xiuzhuo than Yao Wenyu. This was because Yao Wenyu was aloof and far detached from the mundane world; he could not do stuff that would get his hands dirty. He had such a good station in life, so much that it was also that tortuous when he hurt.

The students' morale soared, and they all crowded onto the platform, each trying to impart words of wisdom to Yao Wenyu.

Yao Wenyu's coughing had already stopped. His expression remained unchanged, as if he had already anticipated this situation. Shen Zechuan did not lack people under his command; when Kong Ling was still in the academy, he was also an eloquent master of debate, but Shen Zechuan still agreed to let Yao Wenyu come. As a bosom friend, he understood that Yao Wenyu did not need pity, not even a smidgen of it.

"Luo Mu set this trap wanting to kill Yuanzhuo." Shen Zechuan tilted his head slightly to the side, and the jade earring by his ear glinted coldly from the reflected light. "Even so, he has to be worthy of doing so."

To belittle Yao Wenyu was to belittle Shen Zechuan. The advisors under Shen Zechuan's command possessed both integrity and ability, yet Yao Wenyu had always securely retained his position at the head. Two years ago, Yao Wenyu cut a sorry sight when he left the capital, but that had been two years ago. It had to be known that the one he assisted was the overlord of Zhongbo, Shen Zechuan.

It was a tad clamorous on the platform. The students' voices crowded into the heavy rain, buried under the waves of bamboo as the cool breeze blew. Yao Wenyu moved down the handkerchief covering his lips.

“All of you advise me to realize the error of my ways and turn back from the path that has led me astray, but I wish to advise all of you to repent and seek the salvation at hand.” Yao Wenyu’s voice was still clear and mellow. It was as if those few coughs were merely a breather he took in the rain. “May I ask of Teacher Cen, why do you rack your brain to remonstrate with the Emperor at the risk of death?”

Cen Yu answered, “To deter the villains and set hierarchy right.”

Yao Wenyu showed his true worth when the wind rose. “Not so. You spare no effort to think of the people’s welfare. You aim for stability and sue for peace, taking the people’s will in mind. You put the people first in everything you do, regarding the people as the foundation of the state every single moment. And now you’ve subverted hierarchy and turned your back on the people, all for your own selfish interest to preserve the imperial court. Cen Xunyu, Kong Boran, Xue Yanqing—how can all of you still have the face to pay your respects to my Teacher?!”

He rarely looked so solemn, and his words were so cutting Cen Yu staggered back and rasped in a hoarse voice, “We...”

Still with a composed, unchanging expression, Yao Wenyu continued, “Let me ask you again. Of the so-called remedy of the malady, return of the commoners’ fields, security of the people’s livelihood, and rectification of hierarchy, which of these four have you people achieved?”

Cen Yu was already losing steam. “The field taxes from Dancheng, Chuancheng, Wucheng, and Dicheng have all been recovered, and the fields in the four cities have been returned to the people, with taxes reduced. It is now a time of rebuilding.”

“To make up for the Chuancheng’s field taxes, the Marquis of Helian had the local gentry under him extort the people. The fields have indeed been returned, but the Gobi desert was used to pass off as fertile farmland. Refugees from the four cities are still emerging one after another in a never-ending stream. Cizhou is already overcrowded. You are merely putting inconsequential measures over what’s crucial with your so-called remedy of the malady, return of the commoners’ fields, security of the people’s livelihood. The grains all of you take to distribute as aid relief are all graciously granted by our Prefectural Lord!”

How could Cen Yu expect Yao Wenyu to state his views with such swift relentlessness? The dispute over the Chuancheng fields was a proven fact. It was only because of the external threat that they had no choice but to temporarily put a halt to the investigation, and now, it had become Yao Wenyu's sharp weapon!

The student beside Cen Yu reacted swiftly and retorted, "What a load of nonsense! You betrayed the emperor and brought dishonor to your teacher. You are merely a dying man dragging out a shameful existence in a wheelchair. What did you do? What can you do?!"

The donkey under Yao Wenyu inched forward a little, and Yao Wenyu answered, "I am but a strategist. How can I act beyond my authority?"

The student promptly broke out into laughter. "That's just a perfunctory excuse. You have done nothing at all! His Excellency Xue denounces the noble clans and assists the Li clan. He is revered by all in Dancheng, Chuancheng, and the various cities! You question how they have the face to meet the Secretariat Elder, but Yao Wenyu, seems to me you are the one who is too ashamed to face the Secretariat Elder!"

Yao Wenyu's oil umbrella swayed slightly. He laughed too, but this laugh left no trace in its wake. If it was gone, it was gone. There was not a hint of complacency. "He who holds rank in a state discusses its policies.<sup>130</sup> Shouldn't it be only right for you to work for the people when you live on the emperor's salary? I cannot compare to Xue Yanqing when it comes to administering Qudu and keeping the empire in balance. He is a minister of the imperial court. I am a strategist."

His eyes dimmed slightly. The twinkling starlight in them died out, leaving behind only a heavy, pitch-black night.

"My lord navigated among the heroes in turbulent times, first quelling the scourge of banditry in Chazhou and Cizhou, then scouring the six prefectures clean of its sufferings. He established a thriving trade route between the north and south and spared no effort to help the Armored Cavalry stamp out foreign threats. In two years, he recovered lost lands, brought stability all over, and secured the livelihoods of the people, creating tens of thousands of mu<sup>131</sup> of fertile lands in the three prefectures, and leaving not a single wasteland in the three borders. He pushed for the census registry and implemented household registrations. He advocated freedom of speech to draw in the virtuous talents in the world, and he does not let family status and past history cut short a hero's future. What's more, he even dared to use himself as a sword to defend the city gates of Duanzhou!"

The rain pitter-pattered on his umbrella, like the deafening, urgent beats of the battle drums.

“In assisting a good lord, I am the clouds of rain in the sky, gathering and dispersing as I please. I can have no name to speak of, no virtues to boast of, and no merits to laud. But my master,” Yao Wenyu was as steady as the mountain as he enunciated his words with clarity, “must shine in history for a thousand autumns.”

Strategist!

Strategists and court ministers were both people who assisted outstanding masters. Yao Wenyu dared to belittle himself and his achievements to boost Shen Zechuan because he was Shen Zechuan’s strategist. It was for Shen Zechuan and not for himself that he sought to conquer the empire and build up a reputation. With every word he spoke, he was counter-asking everyone from Qudu, what has Li Jianting done? The lack of achievements to one’s master’s name was all on the incompetence of the people assisting him.

Cen Yu braced himself to push on. “For all your eloquence and glib tongue, you cannot hide the fact that Shen Zechuan’s origin lacks legitimacy. His father, Shen Wei, suffered military defeat in the six prefectures. If we were to let you enter the city, everyone in the world would have to pay their respect to that shameless traitor Shen Wei in the future!”

“And so,” Yao Wenyu said, “Li Jianting’s origin is legitimate?”

“How audacious!” The student’s face flushed red on seeing how unperturbed and composed Yao Wenyu was, even more so when he saw that the latter had also gained the upper hand. “Is Her Majesty’s honorable name something you—”

Yao Wenyu suddenly raised his voice in the rain to ask again, “Who can prove in public today that Li Jianting is legitimate? You? Xue Yanqing? You people revered her as your lord, kneeling and kowtowing to her, and yet you can’t even come to a conclusion about her authenticity. What a joke!”

“His Excellency Xue has the former emperor’s verification in writing...” The student was already thrown into confusion. “There was an auspicious omen when Her Majesty was born. It can’t be wrong. It can’t be wrong...”

“Since you people cannot prove it,” Yao Wenyu suppressed a cough, “I can.”

Cen Yu suddenly felt a chill as he looked at Yao Wenyu’s green robe swaying, feeling that this was not Yuanzhuo, but an enemy who hailed from Zhongbo.

Credits: Thanks to Gale for noticing the oversight! <3

◇ CHAPTER 277: INTENSE BATTLE ◇

“When Xue Yanqing invited the Heir Apparent back to the palace, he produced the former emperor’s endorsement and Prince Qin’s personal seal to show the Grand Secretariat.” Yao Wenyu brushed his finger lightly over his pale lips. “But these objects have no relevance whatsoever to one another. Prince Qin’s personal seal was not stamped on the endorsement itself. If these objects alone can prove that Li Jianting is Prince Qin’s daughter of lawful birth, then the writings of the late nobles in the study of my Yao clan are all proof of sovereignty.”

Even if Cen Yu’s limbs were growing increasingly cold, he could not show any more signs of weakness. All eyes were on this face-to-face talk at the foot of the city today. All it took was one wrong answer to doom Qudu. He composed himself before saying, “When Her Majesty entered the palace, the Grand Secretariat carried out a public verification right there and then on the imperial court. The Empress Dowager also gave the nod to confirm that Her Majesty was of the Li clan’s bloodline!”

The rain in the wind made a ruckus as it pelted down upon the oil paper umbrella like exploding beans.

“After the passing of the former emperor, the Li clan fell into decline,” Yao Wenyu said. “The so-called public examination on the imperial court you speak of is merely based on the one-sided words of Xue Yanqing. The Empress Dowager lived alone deep in the palace, with eunuchs in power holding her hostage on the inside and sycophantic officials coercing her on the outside. So, could she have been able to tell the truth?”

Cen Yu felt a punch to his guts. He stepped back in a fluster and sputtered, “Sycophantic... How can you say I am a sycophantic official... On the day of the public examination, the whole court of civilian and military officials was present. Whoever dares to coerce the Empress, I will be the first to kill him with my own hands!”

“Fine. You are loyal. I admire you for it.” Yao Wenyu pulled out a letter from his sleeve pocket and said to Cen Yu, “I happen to have a confidential letter from Third Missy, which details the fact that Han Cheng coerced the Empress Dowager with the Dicheng’s accounts, along with a family letter between the Empress Dowager and Third Missy. All of them are affixed with the Empress Dowager’s personal seal.”

An uproar arose in the rain the moment this letter emerged.

Cen Yu had never expected Yao Wenyu to have genuine proof. That chill soared up his spine—It was not Zhongbo that was in danger today at all, but Qudu! Bracing himself against the edge of the table next to him, he said, “Third Missy has been away from Qudu for a long time. She no longer waits upon the Empress Dowager. Her words...”

“Third Missy is the eldest madam of Qidong.” Yao Wenyu pressed in hard with each word. “If her words are not to be trusted, why are Qidong’s 300,000-strong garrison troops still not deployed to date?”

Muffled thunder crashed in the rain.

Yao Wenyu released his grip and let the letter fall into a water puddle. “The Qi clan would rather lose their century of prestigious reputation than send troops to the emperor’s aid, because the one sitting on the throne today is not a sovereign of the Li clan at all. Xue Yanqing deliberately misrepresented the fact, calling a deer a horse. He not only deceived everyone in the imperial court, but also fraudulently used a girl from a pleasure quarter to pose as the imperial heir!”

A girl from a pleasure quarter!

“You delude people with rumors and lies...” A student pointed at Yao Wenyu and snapped, “Her Majesty is the daughter of a farming household in Qudu. She has long had a benevolent reputation among her neighbors...”

“How muddleheaded.” There was no warmth in Yao Wenyu’s eyes. “Li Jianting has never summoned her adoptive parents after ascending to the throne. If she is truly benevolent and filial, she will not be so unconcerned and indifferent to her adoptive parents.”

At this word, Cen Yu and even the students beside him all fell onto their butts on the ground. The Capital Command Troops of Qudu whispered among themselves in horror. Dark clouds had already pressed in towards the palace halls in Qudu. Amidst the lightning and thunder, a flash of lightning illuminated the sinister-looking upturned eaves. That letter was swiftly passed throughout the various lands in the southwest as Imperial Bodyguards who were still hiding in Qudu roved the streets and alleys. Ge Qingqing occupied a teahouse and watched as the raindrops pounded on the window paper.

Li Jianting raised her head and listened to the thunder, well-acquainted as she was with the pounding of battle drums. She asked the empty Mingli Hall, "Has the Prince of Donglie sent troops?"

Fengquan lit an incense stick and replied, "Soon."

The rustling sound of clothes chafing rang out from within the screen. Jiran sat upright across from the small table, taking Liu-niang's pulse through a handkerchief.<sup>132</sup>

"The entire Qi clan is all patriotic and chivalrous people. The old commander-in-chief has an illustrious record of military achievements to his name and is in Her Majesty's good graces," Jiang Qingshan said, "With the empire now in imminent danger and rife with internal strifes, it's time for the Qi clan to restore its position as the treasured weapon of the state. I advise Commander-in-chief Qi not to corrupt the righteous cause over personal friendships. Revere your sovereign, and you will be hailed by all. The future glory and honor of the Qi clan are right at hand."

"You are a capable minister who governs a territory, so you are more familiar with civil administration than me." Qi Zhuyin drank her tea, "Since the time has come when the empire is in a crisis, we can skip all these cliches."

Thick steam enshrouded the tea pavilion. Jiang Qingshan let out a wry, bitter laugh for a moment before continuing, "So the persuasion of honor and glory are all no more than mere platitudes. I came here just to share a few heartfelt words with Commander-in-chief Qi." He set down the teacup and looked at Qi Zhuyin. "Commander-in-chief Qi, if the current emperor is incompetent, I would not have come today. But now, the revitalization of Dazhou is right around the corner. As long as the internal threats are eliminated, the prosperity of the people will not be an absurd proposition."

He paused for a moment.

“When the former emperor was on the throne, he did not involve himself in court administration. There were countless tussles for power between various factions in the imperial court. The year when Juexi was hit with a drought, I could not gather sufficient grains to distribute as relief aid. I was at my wit’s end and could only borrow grains hastily, thus incurring a towering debt. It was Yanqing who hurried overnight to Qudu to implore the Grand Secretariat to give me a way out. At that time, when Hua Siqian wanted to kill me, it was also Yanqing who kneeled before the door of the Secretariat Elder and pleaded with him to save me. All these years, he has been running around in his position as the Ministry of Revenue Supervising Secretary and fighting for a future for capable local officials. He went to great efforts and pains to build up the so-called practical doers faction of the present day, one that has allowed Dazhou to continue to keep struggling on after the reign of Tianchen. Commander-in-chief Qi, we dare not claim credit for ourselves, but in order to fight for a way out for Dazhou, we can even bet our lives and those of our families!”

Jiang Wanxiao was not lying. The corrupted dynasty of the later years of the reign of Yongyi had its roots in Qudu, but the local regions were still doing all they could to keep going. Juexi’s current ability to bear the weight of the burdens exerted on Dazhou was not something that could be achieved overnight. It was the result of the cornerstone that people like him had laid down together over the past decade or so.

“After the reign of Xiande, Yanqing has been making every effort to persuade the imperial court to allocate manpower to Zhongbo to clean up the mess there. Given the height of Hua Siqian’s power then, the Secretariat Elder did not dare to act rashly in order to protect the officials of humble origins in the central administration. It was only finally until Hua Siqian’s fall in the eighth year of Xiande that the Grand Secretariat had the intent to transfer me to Zhongbo to take up the post as its Provincial Administration Commissioner, but it was already too late; we had missed the golden opportunity. Not only were there bandits running rampant in the six prefectures, there was also the deeply-rooted influence of the noble clans at play.” Jiang Wanxiao spoke until he was emotionally worked up and could not help but pound the table in despondency. Letting loose a long sigh, he continued, “We have no troops and no power, so how are we to get about doing it? The transfer notice alone took the Grand Secretariat half a year to deliberate over!”

The fragrance of tea was dimly discernible. He composed himself a little before continuing, “I had originally given up. It was Yanqing who supported Her Majesty and did his best to pursue the Dancheng’s field taxes. Commander-in-chief Qi, if Her Majesty was an A-Dou,<sup>133</sup> an incompetent weakling like the former emperor, then let Shen Zechuan rebel as he wishes! But there is now light at the end of the tunnel.” He looked at Qi Zhuyin and said with urgency, “When Commander-in-chief Qi wanted to send troops to assist Libei at the start of the first year of the reign of Shengyin, we agreed because of the foreign threat at hand, and we also provided military salaries and provisions. The situation is no longer like how it was during the reign of Xiande when the commander-in-chief and the generals had to enter the capital and kneel to beg for their military salaries. The Bianjun Commandery’s moldy grains case forced Lu Guangbai into rebelling, yet the Grand Secretariat has still yet to heed the imperial censors’ advice to strip the Lu clan of their noble title and rank. They wanted to give the imperial court and Lu Guangbai a chance to start over again. Let’s all start afresh. There will be no interference from the noble clans this time, only mutual sincerity and frankness between the civilian and military officials. The resurgence of Dazhou is right now.”

Everything Jiang Wanxiao said today were heartfelt words that the others could not fathom, comprehend, or even be willing to understand. They were all turning cogs in the wheel that was Dazhou. When mottled signs of rust began to show, they relied on generation after generation of virtuous talents to keep it oiled and running. This person was not just one person. He could be Qi Huilian in the early years, Hai Liangyi in the latter stage, and even Xue Xiuzhuo at present. They differed from the noble clans. Even if their ideologies were in conflict, or even if their philosophies were contradictory, they all expended their true abilities on civilian affairs without exception. They were the last gleam of hope for the survival of this old, decaying tree.

“Shen Zechuan introduced the census registry in the six prefectures of Zhongbo, while we have long since implemented the household registration in Juexi. Ever since I had jurisdiction over the thirteen cities, the yamen in the various areas have been checking every year that no land was lost, no field has gone to waste, and the trade at the port is thriving. If Shen Zechuan had not insisted on interfering, the Port of Yongyi would not have been closed this year!" Jiang Wanxiao said. "The reason the eight cities' field taxes were suspended was that Shen Zechuan was pushing too hard. He self-proclaimed himself the prefectural lord in Zhongbo, and the three regions all termed him an overlord. The noble clans were going to be driven to take extreme measures, so there was no other alternative but to stop the investigation—"

Within the screen, Liu-niang suddenly exclaimed softly. Jiang Qingshan's voice came to an abrupt stop. He rose slightly. Hongying stepped out from behind the screen and whispered something in Hua Xiangyi's ear.

Hua Xiangyi looked at Jiang Qingshan and said, "The madam is weak and frail, and after being on the go, the fetus is unstable. I fear she will have to stay here for a few days to recuperate."

Liu-niang had been in ill health since the reign of Xiande. Jiang Qingshan knew that what Hua Xiangyi had said was true. Even as he was all caught up attempting to convince them with his fervent rhetoric, he was on tenterhooks worrying about Liu-niang. For a moment, he lost his voice and could neither stand nor sit.

Jiran said in a small voice, "Anitabha, the madam has to put on medication."

Jiang Qingshan could not help but ask, "What kind of medicine? She's frail, and all the physicians she usually sees have been cautious."

"I heard you have been married for several years, and yet your mother still wants to make her stand in attendance every day. Never mind if it had been in the past," Hua Xiangyi said with a slightly reproachful tone, "but why does she still have to do so even when she's pregnant? What kind of rule is that?"

The hardest thing for Jiang Wanxiao to speak of was his domestic affairs. His mother was widowed at an early age, and against all the odds, raised him to be a provincial governor. The Old Madam typically could not be bribed with gold and valuables, nor did she form social connections with the womenfolk of the eunuchs. She wholeheartedly wanted Jiang Qingshan to be an uncorrupted official. The only drawback was that she was too strict with the family regulations in her management of the household, especially when it came to Liu-niang.

Qi Zhuyin originally had no intention to speak up. She had a whole bunch of family troubles at home to be vexed about too. But then, she felt a nudge to her leg under the table. She came to a tacit understanding as she drank her tea and put down the cup. "I think you should leave aside government affairs for now. There's still no news from Qudu, so let's have madam settled down first."

Jiang Wanxiao had already sensed something amiss. Cautiously, he probed, "About the sending of troops..."

"I'll think about it for a couple more days," Qi Zhuyin said with a serious countenance. "Two days later, I'll definitely give you an answer."

Fei Shi covered his head as he ran through the rain. He could hear the sound of discussions all around him; traitor, emperor, bogus. Qudu, with its century of history, tottered precariously on the precipice in this rainstorm. He ran till his shoes were soaked. Someone knocked into him, causing him to stagger.

The junior marquis of the past was dressed simply. After Marquis of Helian was paralyzed, his disreputable friends no longer associated with him. His residence could no longer afford the upkeep of its help, so they had no choice but to dismiss their older maids and servants. Fei Shi initially wanted to continue with his idle ways, but when he saw his elder sister Zhaoyue take care of her child while toiling away all night doing embroidery for a living, he realized then that his family was thoroughly broke. Now, he was eking out a livelihood by writing letters for others.

Fei Shi cursed as he picked up the letters, "Damn dog must be blind to bump into me! Do you know your grandfather me used to lord it over..." He wiped the rain off his face. Finding the person who had fallen to the ground familiar, he kicked him with his foot. "Hey?"

This person abruptly raised his head. He was so unkempt and disheveled that his face was not clearly distinguishable. He merely clapped his hands at Fei Shi and giggled in a silly manner, "Junior Marquis! Junior Marquis!"

Fei Shi pocketed the letter and said, "Yo, you're an observant one. That's me."

This lunatic was filthy all over, and only one of his feet had a shoe on. Shaking his head, he said, "Junior Marquis, looking, looking for my eldest brother!"

"I'm not your eldest fucking brother!" Fei Shi yanked his clothes back. Disgusted with the man's stench, he drove him away. "Shoo, shoo, shoo!"

This lunatic bared his mouth in a grin and really left. He jumped around in the rainstorm, yelling at everyone he came across, "Eldest brother, my eldest brother is a major official! A major official with a blade!"

"What bad luck." Fei Shi muttered as he took two steps forward. He found this voice really familiar. He took a few more steps where he saw the run-down Han residence across the curtain of rain and suddenly froze right on the spot.

"The Capital Command Troops are passing through! Move out of the way!"

Military boots stepped on the rainwater, sending them splashing as they ran across the streets of Qudu. The entire city was on high alert, and the defensive weapons in the armory had all been taken out and moved to the top of the city wall. The news that Shen Zechuan was about to fight his way in was even more widespread than news of the female emperor's origins.

The Capital Command Troops bumped Fei Shi aside. He was still staring blankly in shock as he turned his head around like a wooden statue.

"Han... Han Jin!"

Yao Wenyu retreated unscathed after his verbal sparring with the masses. His donkey switched direction, and the oil paper umbrella skewed slightly aside, causing the side of the hem of his green robe to be soaked by the rain.

Still in shock, Cen Yu supported himself against the edge of the table and raised a hand, wanting to call out to Yuanzhuo again.

A soldier behind soundlessly hoisted up a bow and arrow. The raised arrow pressed against his fingers, stretching the bowstrings taut. Raindrops, meanwhile, formed strings of beads at the edge of the oil paper umbrella. Yao Wenyu's breathing was slightly disorderly. The handkerchief he had been tightly clutching had long since been soaked red.

Humiliated from the defeat, a student chased a few steps after him and said, "Shen Zechuan seeks to obtain the empire. Wanting us to honor Shen Wei's memorial tablet is an act that is neither virtuous nor righteous. Even if I die, I will not kneel to him!"

The downpour of rain engulfed the sound of Yao Wenyu's coughing. When he looked back, however, his tightly pursed lips lifted slightly. The oil paper umbrella slid to the ground. His hair was soaked through, but he was resolute and decisive as he said, “All this time we rise in power in Zhongbo, there have only been talks about the defeat of Shen Wei’s military troops. His Lordship brought peace and stability to the lands for the sake of the common people, neither marrying nor begetting a son. What’s more, he wants to overturn the old case from the reign of Yongyi to redress the injustice of the loyal officials. There is no need for you to kneel. When the country is stable and the commoners’ livelihoods are restored, and when the granaries of the world are in abundance, His Lordship—

That arrow suddenly took leave of its bowstring, and the vibration from the bowstring flicked forth a spray of raindrops. In the blink of an eye, the sharp glint came before Yao Wenyu. No sooner said than done, a swift sword suddenly came thrusting down from among the green bamboo. Amidst the sound of collision between sword and arrow, Qiao Tianya landed on the ground.

Shen Zechuan stood afar at the watchtower and looked in Qudu’s direction. The wind brushed against his overcoat, sending it fluttering. Surprisingly enough, there were bits of ice and snow mixed in with that torrential rain.

“One does not execute the envoy when two armies are in talks,” the Prefectural Lord said. “By doing so, Qudu is counting on our lack of people to bully our Zhongbo.”

Qiao Tianya slowly straightened up and stood in front of Yao Wenyu. Locks of his drenched hair covered his eyes. He pushed his sheath apart with his thumb and commanded, “Draw your blades.”

Rainwater covered the Imperial Army’s armors as the glints of the blades instantly flashed in the bamboo forest.

The incense burned out.

◇ CHAPTER 278: HERO ◇

Cen Yu knew it did not bode well the moment he saw the arrow flying, and when he saw the Imperial Army drawing their blades, he was in such a state of anxiety that he also coughed out blood. Cutting a sorry sight as he covered his mouth, he demanded, “Who fired the arrow?!”

When he came, he instructed Luo Mu to give strict orders to his soldiers not to make any move. Now that this arrow had been fired, Qudu was doomed whether or not Yao Wenyu died!

Tantai Hu swiftly charged forward with his blade and hollered in a booming voice, “You went back on your word. To hell with your talks at the foot of the city!”

The Imperial Army dashed orderly forth in the rain. Muddy water on the ground splattered all over. They wielded their blades in unison and, at the same time the front row spun around and slashed, barged into the motley crew of soldiers. Flashes of blades and glints of swords instantly enveloped the rainstorm. Tables and chairs on the platform overturned noisily with a clatter. The students helped Cen Yu up and retreated in a panic.

“Stop...” Cen Yu, who still held out false hopes, said in an urgent voice as he wiped his blood, “Your Lordship, please hear me out!”

The Imperial Army had already charged across the boundary line. No one listened to Cen Yu. He soaked in the rain, his official robe hanging loosely on his body. Enduring the assault of rain and snow on his face, he finally broke down and choked with sobs in Qudu’s direction, “I have failed Her Majesty!”

The bronze bell in Qudu suddenly rang with a thunderous crash. Li Jianting knew that it was not the sound of thunder. Supporting herself against the pillars, she slowly stepped into the rain. The flower embellishment between her forehead dispersed on touching water. She looked at Xue Xiuzhuo at the foot of the stairs, as if she had only just met him.

“You have ten thousand taels of silver,” Li Jianting raised her arm to point in Juexi’s direction, “and the support of the common people. Go to Juexi and find a new emperor, and you’d still be able to fight against Shen Zechuan again.”

Xue Xiuzhuo looked at Li Jianting too. After a long while, he raised his hands to take off his official wusha hat and said, “I am a court minister of the Li clan.”

Li Jianting smiled, and her laughter grew increasingly louder. She laughed until her face was wet with rainwater, betraying a little of her naivety. She moved closer and asked, “Teacher, have I succeeded in learning?”

All her life, she had been stuck in a crack.<sup>134</sup> It was only after gouging the nails of her ten fingers rotten that she finally amounted to something. She came from a puddle of mud, yet she bore the weight of a collapsing universe. She was inquisitive, assiduous, and even a genius of sorts, but she was all the same too powerless to save the situation.

“Could have been better. It’s all because my qualifications are mediocre.” Xue Xiuzhuo looked at the wusha hat in his hands. “I am the blade that went off course.”

He had long known that he was not smart. He could not remember the essays on contemporary politics. All he could do was to memorize them by rote and stay up all night burning the midnight oil. Even the time he took to drink a mouthful of water was a waste. At the age where he was at his most impulsive, Emperor Guangcheng dealt a blow to his morale and drive, and he came to the understanding that the seemingly prosperous Dazhou was, in truth, a barren expanse.

It never occurred to Xue Xiuzhuo that he would take this path. But he witnessed the sudden flash of light Qi Huilian had sparked, and that momentary light ignited his hope. He followed Qi Huilian, stubbornly believing that Dazhou could still be saved, but the reality was always so disappointing. He revered and respected Hai Liangyi, but then, he gradually went separate ways with him.

They all wanted to save Dazhou.

And none of them succeeded.

“You brought me to this position, but no one here is willing to be reasonable. The Empress Dowager instigated Han Cheng who in turn dropped hints to Fuman. They all wanted to kill me.” Li Jianting raised her arm and rubbed away at the flower embellishment between her forehead until it was all red. “Can’t the emperor fight back? If I don’t kill them, I’ll die.” She turned around. “We exercise caution and stay put in this cage, but even if we have ambitions, we do not have the power, let alone time.”

Li Jianting was very fair, a facade cultivated from being raised in the Xue’s residence. Under this layer of attire, she was battered and bruised all over. When she stood here, she was Li Jianting. No one would ask about Ling Ting’s whereabouts, as if Ling Ting deserved to die.

“In this world, people don’t actually need the law to kill people. The sturdy bodies of men crushed my bones, and I fell to the ground.” Li Jianting looked back and said to Xue Xiuzhuo. “The passersby find me filthy. No one would hold them accountable, as if I lay there willingly. Die once, and I deserve to be treated as discarded shoes, never allowed to stand again before others.”

The toll of the bronze bell grew increasingly longer. Rainwater flooded past the hems of their robes. The sky was so dark and overcast that the palace could not be clearly seen.

Li Jianting said mockingly, “Was that my fault? Teacher, I heeded the teachings of the books and did not even kill those scums. The day you took me away from Xiangyun Villa, I thought I would seek revenge, but you taught me benevolence, justice, morality, and virtue. I had to endure it to stay in this rotten palace. In all these years, there was not a single moment I’ve let go to waste. I chased after everyone, trying to catch up, but in the end, we still ended up with nothing to our name.”

Her chest heaved. There were so many things she could not take lying down. As her forbearance hit its limits, she finally erupted.

Li Jianting pointed to her eyes and said, “I don’t rely on these eyes to live. I am not like anyone else. I am Li Jianting.” She suddenly took off the golden hairpin in her hair and flung it into the rain. Contemptuously, she spat, "To hell with virtues and deference. I am an emperor. I am the last emperor of the Li!"

Thunder detonated in the vault of heaven, illuminating everyone's faces snowy-white in the rain. Li Jianting took off her soaked overcoat and even yanked off the cumbersome hairpins.

Her voice was frosty as she proclaimed, "I live and die with Dazhou."

Qudu had eight city gates, all of which were now sealed off. The crossbow triggers at the top of the city wall made clicking sounds as they turned. The armory of the original Eight Great Training Divisions had been emptied out, and bows and arrows densely lined the battlements. The Zhongbo Garrison troops, meanwhile, concentrated their attacks on the main east gate.

"With the Eldest Madam holding the fort in Qidong, Jiang Wanxiao won't be able to return." Yao Wenyu's gasps were slightly urgent as he propped himself up on the edge of the bed and said to Shen Zechuan, "The path ahead has been paved. I will be here waiting for Your Lordship to return in triumph."

Shen Zechuan took off his own Yang Shan Xue and set it beside Yao Wenyu's hand. "I am entrusting this blade to you. Give it back to me when I return."

Yao Wenyu smiled sadly. "Why put me in such a spot?"

"Xun'er is still in Cizhou." The expression in Shen Zechuan's eyes dimmed slightly. "You are still his teacher."

Yao Wenyu could only answer, "Yuanzhuo shall do his best."

Fei Sheng took off the overcoat for Shen Zechuan. Shen Zechuan took two steps back and held Yao Wenyu's eyes for a moment, then turned around to step out of the tent without another word. Fei Sheng got his hands on Yao Wenyu's handkerchief when he tidied up the tent in passing, and realized that the latter's handkerchief was soaked through and through with blood.

Amid the damp and dense flurry of snow outside the tent, the wind made its abrupt arrival known.

Shen Zechuan strode down the steps. The gazes of the Imperial Army on both sides never once strayed. As he walked, he secured his arm guard, and when he brushed past Tantai Hu, he heard the latter bellow with his head held high, "Tonight, we shall kill our way into Qudu, and from here on, the fate of the empire shall be decided depending on which way the scale tips. His Lordship takes the lead in bringing the soldiers forth in a charge, and we shall repay in kind with sincerity and loyalty!”

The garrison troops pounded their chests simultaneously with the Imperial Army, their voices so deafening they drowned out the thunder, “We shall repay in kind with sincerity and loyalty!”

Luo Mu, having heard the bellows, dashed towards the city wall in the pouring rain and yanked ahold of the assistant commander who had fled back into the city, “Who fired the arrow?!” He demanded.

The assistant commander had returned wounded from the frenzied surge of the Imperial Army earlier. Hauling around his injured arm, he answered, “The rain is too heavy, Governor-General. There was no way to see who it was at all!”

Luo Mu did give his motley crew of soldiers the instruction that they could act, but that had to be after the garrison troops made the first move. Even Luo Mu himself never expected Yao Wenyu to make an issue of the emperor’s origins in this battle. This one arrow broke Qudu’s defense, imperceptibly making it clear to all that even Heaven had turned away from them!

“Shut the gates and fight to the death.” Luo Mu released his hand, then shoved his deputy general hard and barked all around him in the heavy rain, “If we can’t defend Qudu, you and I will die!”

The streets were empty, for the commoners all had their doors and windows sealed shut as they hid away in their courtyard cellar, shivering uncontrollably. Public ditches discharged sewage, and the gaily-painted pleasure boats on Kailing River swayed with the motions. This was the first time in hundreds of years that Qudu felt a compelling sense of impending storm.

“The troops of the Shen clan are at the foot of the city.” Pages of paper fluttered all over the imperial college as the students covered their heads and wailed, “There is no hope left for Dazhou!”

Luo Mu saw several rows of people from afar while he was urging the pounding of battle drums. He put down the drooping banner and stepped forth to kneel and kowtow. Loudly, he said, “This humble subject has failed to live up to Her Majesty’s kindness. Tonight, I shall repay my country with my death. I vow to never wallow in the same mire as the rebels!”

Kong Qiu hobbled forward and held on to Li Jianting's arm. He choked with emotions all around him. "Her Majesty is here, as am I. If we can win tonight, all of you here will be Dazhou's most trustworthy subjects! If we can't, then I, Kong Qiu, shall be the first to jump off to die for my country when the city is breached!"

Luo Mu was so startled by Kong Qiu's bleak and miserable voice he broke out in a cold sweat. He raised his head and saw each of the Grand Secretariat ministers looking solemn. Clearly, they were not putting on a show of appeasement; they really had the determination to give their lives for the cause! Luo Mu did not expect them to be willing to go to such an extent for Dazhou, and in that instant, he felt ashamed of himself, but at the same time, he also took his chances.

"Shen Zechuan only has 25,000 soldiers. This battle is doable! Your Majesty and the various excellencies—"

The words had yet to fully leave Luo Mu's mouth when the stone catapults sprang into action. The massive boulder smashed into the city gate with a thunderous crash, and the century-old "Qudu" stone inscription monument promptly exploded apart into smithereens.

Xue Xiuzhuo brandished an arm to stop Li Jianting from moving. "Shen Zechuan has begun his assault on the city. Protect the emperor!"

Holding a dagger in his mouth, Qiao Tianya moved himself with his elbows and crawled in the dark and damp public ditch.

Back then, after the public ditch case, Pan Lin gave the construction blueprint of Qudu's public ditches to Xiao Chiye, who in turn left this blueprint in his Plum Blossom Residence. When Shen Zechuan rebelled and fled from Zhongbo, Qiao Tianya and Fei Sheng relied on this blueprint to escape from the heavy siege in Qudu. They had long since committed the public ditches that intersected Qudu to memory.

Qiao Tianya's chin was buried in the stinking sewage. He lifted his head slightly and slammed his shoulder against the slanting wooden planks above him at the end of the ditch.

The chains and lock on the wooden planks shifted away with a clatter. Ge Qingqing, who had shaved himself clean of his mustache, traded glances with Qiao Tianya and promptly broke out into a smile as he reached out to pull the latter out.

"It has been over a year since we last met," Ge Qingqing said. "How is His Lordship?"

Qiao Tianya took off his dagger and answered succinctly, "Fine."

"We have been keeping an eye on the movements within Qudu these past few days." Ge Qingqing cut the pleasantries and fished out a blueprint with areas circled in various colors. "The 'Scorpions' are here."

Qiao Tianya looked at those dense clusters of circles covering the blueprint and felt his blood freeze.

"These people can't put down roots and can only drift around Qudu waiting on standby for their orders. The majority of them are people of various trades from the three doctrines and nine schools of thoughts."<sup>135</sup> Ge Qingqing covered up the crossed-out areas. "His Lordship was right in his guess. They have a 'leader' directing the operation."

Qiao Tianya stared at the position where the "leader" was.

"The Scorpions want to hold off His Lordship for Amu'er." Ge Qingqing circled the blueprint with his finger. "Before they make their move, we have to act first. Not a single one must be spared."

Ge Qingqing's finger stopped at the location where the palace was.

Qiao Tianya did not keep away his dagger. He said in a hoarse voice, "Old profession, old regulations. Since Master gave the order to kill, then no one will return alive once the Xiuchun Blade falls. We will split up and act separately." He nailed the dagger to the palace. "I'll head here."

The defense of the main east gate had not even hit the hour mark when the garrison troops that had circled around to the south side gate near the Mount Feng military drill grounds rammed out a gap in the gate. How were the main forces of the Capital Command Troops guarding the main east gate to know that Shen Zechuan had learned this speedy assault from Hasen? It was not only fast but also ruthless.

The Capital Command Troops at the south side gate pressed up against it, but before they could shout out the signal, a blade was wedged in the gap.

"Pass the word," a young general of the Capital Command Troop shouted, "the south side gate has been breached—!"

Another ram instantly caused the city gate to slide sideways, which subsequently knocked the Capital Command Troops inside the city over to the ground. The Imperial Army, who had been waiting outside, braced themselves against the gap and spread open their legs like monkeys to flip in. The archers inside the city readied themselves, but the reactions of the Imperial Army were even faster. They shrank their heads back and hid behind the city gate.

The Capital Command Troops had yet to breathe a sigh of relief when they heard the gate panel of the city gate emit a grating, jarring “creak”. To think the Imperial Army had actually climbed over each other’s shoulders to the top of that properly-mounted, well-crafted, and heavy-duty city gate and tore it down!

“It works!” An Imperial Army soldier rapped on the gate panel and shouted to his brothers below him. “Guess what? This gate is the same fucking gate Second Master led us to repair for the Ministry of Works! Damn handy it is. Hoist it up, and it can block the arrows and smash this bunch of silly dogs to death!”

The morale of the Capital Command Troops that had seen a sharp boost from the presence of the emperor existed for only a moment as Shen Zechuan forcibly held it down by the head and obliterated it clean. The moment the south side gate was breached, the Imperial Army was back in their elements like ducks to water.

Under the crowding and jostling, Kong Qiu protected Li Jianting. Her hair at the temples was disheveled, and she was muddied all over. Her ears were also buzzing from the constant bombardment from the catapults. Amid the wails and urgent cries of countless people, her gaze moved past the mud and dust and fell upon the Prefectural Lord of Zhongbo who was the stuff of rumors.

Two years ago, Shen Zechuan fled through the main east gate, leaving behind a shouting Qi Huilian with his hands raised at the tightly shut city gate. Now, he rode his horse across the public roads, bringing along not only his advisors but also his mighty army.

“Traitor!” Li Jianting hissed through clenched teeth.

Shen Zechuan looked at her apathetically, using a sufficiently direct way to tell her—that the young emperor was no match for a genuine hero with mere designs alone.

From here, he would stomp open the main gates of Qudu.

Credits: Thanks to Katie82 for the feedback! <3

◇ CHAPTER 279: FENGQUAN ◇

Fog shrouded Qudu. Very quickly, Li Jianting's figure was covered up by the chilly rain. She was the last piece of the cloud among these towering palaces, dispersing so fast that she could not even be called an "opponent". The main east gates shook violently under the creaking sounds. Luo Mu, who had once again ascended to the top of the city wall, did all he could to mobilize the soldiers in the city.

"Archers, stand by—"

Before Luo Mu could issue his order, Tantai Hu bellowed, his voice breaking up in the rain, "Ram the gate!"

Even as he spoke, the single branch cannons<sup>136</sup> of Zhongbo had already started blasting away. The Capital Command Troops, who have lived all their lives in Qudu, could not withstand the attack. Unexpectedly enough, it was the motley crew of soldiers that Luo Mu had brought along who could still hang on. Luo Mu was adept at the art of defensive battle back in Chazhou, so he was not afraid of the bandits at all. In his eyes now, Tantai Hu was a bandit!

"Bah!" Luo Mu spat out the mud in his mouth as he coldly eyed the garrison troops storming the city at the foot. "Qudu's city walls have never once fallen in a hundred years. With just those few single branch cannons, this place will still be impregnable even if they keep smashing away until next year." Holding on to the battlement, he shouted to Tantai Hu below him. "Tantai Hu, you and I have once worked together. If you want to save your dignity today, why not surrender to the imperial court now? You can't win this battle!"

Tantai Hu still bore a grudge against Luo Mu for framing him, and he was still fuming deep down. On hearing him, his fury could not help but blaze even harder. He stomped on the battering ram's butt and yelled back, "Shut your trap!"

With this one kick, the soldiers were instantly roused into action. Pushing the battering ram together with Tantai Hu, they rammed it into the city gate again, causing a loud, thunderous crash to ring out.

Unexpectedly, Luo Mu sneered for a moment before brandishing his arm to bark, "Release!"

The rocks that the motley crew of soldiers had long prepared went plummeting from the six-zhang<sup>137</sup> tall wall, raining down like hail upon the garrison troops. Even with helmets, they could not withstand the attack, and those who were hit by the rocks all ended up maimed or worse, killed. The soldiers near the battering ram covered their heads and dodged. A wheel of the battering ram got struck, and the entire wagon instantly tilted over. Because of its astounding weight, it could not be stopped with just a few people, and they could only watch as the battering ram tumbled into the mud.

Tantai Hu wiped the muddy water off his face, knowing that he had fucking fallen for a trap again—Luo Mu had been merely provoking him!

"Laohu!" Fei Sheng circled over on his horse, grasping the Zhongbo military banner with one arm as he shouted to Tantai Hu from afar. "I'm here to pass on His Lordship's words—Fight to your heart's content this battle!" He suddenly waved the banner and pointed at Qudu, "Success or failure, you, Tantai Hu, will always be a fine man of Zhongbo!"

A fine man!

Tantai Hu's blood suddenly pulsed through his veins, firing him up so much that his palms trembled slightly. He had been personally guided by Xiao Chiye himself, yet he kept making mistakes after mistakes under Shen Zechuan's command. Shen Zechuan, however, still gave him chances. Tantai Hu suddenly raised his hand and slapped himself on the cheeks a few times.

These slaps were so merciless that it was particularly loud and clear in the rainstorm.

Tantai Hu's cheeks reddened from the slaps. His eye with the scar opened slightly. The drive was still burning in him, but he was a tad more composed now. Grimly, he answered. "If I don't emerge victorious this battle, then I, Tantai Hu, will no longer be worthy of being His Lordship's subject and Second Master's general! Even if I were to be crushed to powder today, I will stomp this gate open for my master!"

The eunuchs and maids in the palace fought over themselves to grab whatever they could. The sound of fighting and killing at the city gates had spread all over Qudu. They wanted to make their escape before the city was breached. Only one lamp was lit in Mingli Hall. Fengquan removed his official eunuch robe and sat all prim and proper by the side of the tea table. His slim figure resembled that of a young lad among those overlapping, dancing white gauze curtains.

The sound of the rain pitter-pattered swiftly like that of a zither, whilst the color of the sky was dusky like the long stretch of night.

Fengquan kept that weak flame going and raised his head between those dancing gauzes, revealing half of his face. He saw a pair of black boots stop in front of the thin gauze. Rainwater dripped down along the sheath of the other party's sword, forming narrow rings of rippling light on the mirror-like floor.

"Who did you think you would see?" Fengquan asked demurely. "Shao Fengquan?"

With soaking wet locks of hair dangling, Qiao Tianya held down the sheath of his sword. He could not see through those layers after layers of white gauzes. His heavy sleeves dropped to his side, as if binding the hand that held his sword.

Fengquan stroked that lamp as half of his face slowly broke into a smile. Laughter, too, brimmed in that eye.

"You're late," he said softly.

Qiao Tianya raised his eyes.

Fengquan stood up. They were too far apart. It was as if they never knew each other. All those childhood friendships slipped them by in those long, endless passages of time. Songyue, who had circled back to the original starting point, was still holding a seven-stringed zither in his arms, but gradually, he came to the realization that not one of those who left had ever returned.

"You brought your sword along with you when you left Qudu and became the swordsman you always spoke of. Qiao Songyue, I hate you so much all these years.” Fengquan tilted his head up slightly and pointed to his own ear. “And yet all I had with me was this.”

That not-very-conspicuous ear-piercing concealed filth.

“All I had was this...” Fengquan lowered his voice, and his expression grew all the more gloomy. “Look at me. What do I look like?”

He looked so young, his overly pale face having retained the melancholy of his youth. Even his limbs looked as though they had yet to develop into adulthood.

“My father gave you the sword, and my paternal grandmother sent me to Zhongbo, where I met Lei Changming.” Fengquan squeezed the words out through his teeth. “I wanted so badly to die... I almost broke free, but Lei Jingzhe picked me up from the ditch and took me back, just like those mutts he raised. He had me live in Gedale for five years. Five years... I was smarter than those bastards. Amu’er set his eyes on me. He wanted me to be a Lizard and lead the Scorpions in Dazhou on his behalf. But, all I wanted was to come back.”

So Amu’er let him go back.

“Go back to your homeland.” Amu’er handed Fengquan a dagger in front of his golden tent. “Go see your father and friends. If they are still the same as before, you will get your freedom.”

Fengquan took it for real. He returned to Dazhou and reunited with Shao Chengbi as he wished. Fengquan looked at Qiao Tianya’s shadow and continued as if he was telling someone else’s story, “I saw my father, and he was very happy. He stroked my head, then kneeled before me and cried bitter tears.”

“He sent you,” Qiao Tianya said in a hoarse voice, “into the palace.”

“That was only a step in the plan. My father spent the latter half of his life atoning for his sins. It was useless begging Buddha; the Eastern Palace was his nightmare. The Grand Mentor did not die—this fact was the only hope of those former ministers of the Eastern Palace. My father concealed his identity and kept watch outside the doors of Zhaozui Temple, waiting for Qi Huilian to start using him. To avoid arousing suspicions, he had me consume those medicines.” Fengquan pointed to his own chest, the vicissitudes of life in his eyes at odds with his youthful appearance. He adjusted the expression on his face, looking particularly bizarre at this moment. “Who would suspect me? Even if my name was Fengquan, no one would believe that I am Shao Fengquan.”

Xue Xiuzhuo was so cautious, and yet he had never had doubts about Fengquan's identity.

Li Jianting was so vigilant, and yet she still believed Fengquan's lies.

It was not that they were not smart enough, but that Fengquan's appearance had long ceased to be consistent with his age. Shao Chengbi's son was already thirty-six years old this year, but Fengquan still looked as though he had yet to come of age.<sup>138</sup> This discrepancy kept him free from suspicions in Qudu.

Fengquan's eyes were drab and gloomy. He was tired of crying and laughing. This face was not even real.

"What's the use of Qi Huilian?" He said. "That old lunatic was trapped in Zhaozui Temple for twenty years. He was like a dog wagging its tail begging for food, yet he still thought about the success or failure of Dazhou."

Qi Huilian initially did not know that Amu'er had made his foray into these murky waters. When Shen Zechuan left Zhaozui Temple and joined the imperial court in the reign of Tianchen, Qi Huilian looked back on the case of the Zhongbo's troops' defeat and indistinctly sensed that strange, irresistible force at play. Qi Huilian himself did not expect this to be all a massive, intricate game, nor did he expect Fengquan to be the Scorpion that Amu'er had sent back.

"You admire Qi Huilian." White gauze covered Fengquan's side profile. "You're really quite pitiful too. What's the difference between Qi Huilian and Xue Xiuzhuo? They all pride themselves on being figures who would die for the righteous cause, and they all treat others as pawns. My father was even willing to trap me in this shell," Fengquan looked wearily at the top of Mingli Hall, "making me neither human nor ghost, male nor female."

"The Eastern Palace fell victim, and the innocent were caught in the crossfire. Uncle Shao's debt had long since been repaid when the family properties were sealed and confiscated." Qiao Tianya fixed his gaze on the overlapping figure on the white gauze. "You don't owe anyone anything."

Fengquan spread his arms open, dragging his wide sleeves across the tea table. He chuckled and said in a tone that was both envious and mocking, "Qiao Songyue, must be really nice being a swordsman... Why do you think my father would go to such an extent? Because of 'loyalty'?"

The tiny candlelight was about to go out.

“What brought on the downfall of the Eastern Palace at that time was the rebellion papers that the Imperial Bodyguards forged. Who could imitate the handwriting of the Crown Prince and the Eastern Palace advisors to such striking resemblance? A subordinate of the Eastern Palace himself.” Fengquan curbed his smile. “Qiao Kanghai dared to defect to the enemy precisely because he had rendered meritorious service by imitating the Eastern Palace’s handwriting to bring down the Crown Prince for the Empress Dowager.”

Qiao Tianya abruptly tightened his grip on the hilt of his sword.

Fengquan pressed in a step closer, and his sleeves knocked over the tea table., “In order to preserve the lives of your entire family, my father implored Hua Siqian to lend a helping hand, but Hua Siqian refused to, so my father could only go and plead with Shen Wei.”

Qiao Tianya’s breathing was slightly in disarray. “Zhongbo—”

“That’s right!” Fengquan abruptly yanked aside the white gauze before him and cruelly said, “The military defeat of the Zhongbo troops is connected to the leak of the Ministry of War’s military terrain map. That was a map my father gave to Shen Wei, who in turn gave it to Amu’er as a gift for their first encounter!”

Muffled thunder crashed outside the palace hall. The color drained from Qiao Tianya’s face.

“The scimitars slaughtered the cities of the six prefectures.” Fengquan pressed in closer with his sleeves trailing behind him. Unbridled insanity roiled in his eyes. “It’s all thanks to both your and my clans that Shen Zechuan’s entire family perished in that military defeat!”

Qiao Tianya’s joints on the hand grasping the sword’s hilt cracked. Fengquan scrutinized his expression, as if he was scrutinizing the sorry sight Qiao Tianya cut as he retreated again and again in defeat. Qiao Songyue was weather-worn by the vicissitudes of life, but this was not enough. He still inspired envy in others, and even when he drifted and led a wandering life, he was still free.

Fengquan advanced another step, and his face split into black and white sides under the crash of thunder and flash of lightning. His hatred built up in his chest, burning him beyond recognition.

“I returned to my father’s side,” he continued, “but he turned me into a monster to repay his debt.” He grabbed Qiao Tianya by the flaps of his clothes and bent over slightly with his head tilted up to say in an icy tone,

“Every day, every single day, I ask myself who I am. I am a Scorpion, a former subject, and countless people’s dog!” His expression turned hideously savage. “For his own bullshit penance, Shao Chengbi killed me with his very own hands! Look at me. Qiao Songyue, can you recognize who I am?! Qi Huilian was too ruthless. He didn’t trust me, yet he wanted to place me here. I disguised myself as Mu Ru’s younger brother and took Xiaofuzi’s place, imitating the affectations of a child in his youth. Oh...” He gritted his teeth. “All these conceited, self-righteous big shots... Wasn’t Qi Huilian’s death wonderful? I did everything possible to take out Wei Huaigu for him!”

“It was you,” Qiao Tianya raised his hand but did not touch Fengquan, “who replaced the relay report Yang Cheng sent to the Ministry of Justice.”

“It was me...” Fengquan’s hands were trembling with excitement. “Qi Huilian was so clever, but even he could not anticipate that he would die here. He was the one who personally sent me up here. If there were no Shen Zechuan in the equation, the entire world would be a sand table playground at my mercy.”

Yang Cheng reported Wei Huaigu for reselling the military grains, and his relay report was originally meant to be sent to the Ministry of Justice. However, the tag was switched to the Ministry of Revenue’s tag midway through. This move caused Wei Huaigu to suspect that he had already been exposed, and so, in order to keep the others safe, he opted to turn himself in, indirectly prompting Xue Xiuzhuo to take action.

“The epidemic during the reign of Tianchen,” Qiao Tianya’s fingers curled slightly, “was also your doing.”

Back then, Donglong Street’s public ditches were clogged. Ouhua Pavilion collapsed, and an epidemic broke out. Qiao Tianya had once said during his discussion with Xiao Chiye that the epidemic did not start from Donglong Street, but from the palace.

“Had Li Jianheng died on that day,” Fengquan hissed like a snake, “I’d have won this game.”

Of the Scorpions, former subordinates, and informers hiding in the inner court, Fengquan was the one with the upper hand throughout it all. His multiple identities enabled him to possess the intelligence of all the various parties in the game. He was just like a venomous spider lying in ambush in the center of its web, contemplating and observing everyone's movement and actions every single moment.

Qiao Tianya's reddened eyes were emotionless. His Adam's apple throbbed. He did not release his sword even as Fengquan was hauling him by the front of his clothes. He looked at Fengquan and said, "But you still let Uncle Shao set out to battle."

The rainstorm completely cut off the sound of footsteps outside the palace hall. The expression in Fengquan's eyes at this moment was numb. His eyes reddened, he lifted his chin slightly and said contemptuously to Qiao Tianya, "Because I don't want to play anymore."

His contorted, bizarre shadow crept on the ground, following him as he crawled deep into this palace. He gradually lost sight of who he was as the days and nights alternated—he worked for everyone, but he also betrayed all of them. He was not the winner at all. He was a nobody in the anarchy. A nobody who broke free of manipulations.

"I waited for you all in Zhongbo for a very long time," Qiao Tianya said. "All these years, not a single one turned back."

Tears coursed down Fengquan's face as his eyes curved into crescents. Shaking his head, he said, "Oh, Songyue..." He seemed to have returned to the day they once parted. The expression in his eyes was complicated, resembling both envy and abhorrence. "That's because everyone is dead."

Qiao Tianya felt a great stab of pain in his heart. His sword-holding hand trembled uncontrollably. Under the howls of the torrential rain, he seemed to have woken up, to have broken free of that never-ending dream.

He finally understood.

Everyone was dead.

"The Imperial Army has entered the cities!" With the south side gate wide open, the Capital Command Troops ran the hardest they could to pass on the news in all directions. "Reinforcements!"

"No reinforcements!" The motley crew of soldiers shoved the Capital Command Troops who were in the way and looked towards the main east gate in the rain. "The rebels have surrounded Qudu."

"Huaizhou! Where are the reinforcements from Huaizhou?!" Chen Zhen lifted the hem of his robe. "The imperial court sent someone over after Tao Ming left, did they not!"

“There was no response to the transfer order we issued.” Liang Cuishan wiped the rainwater from his face and looked out of the city. “I fear they won’t be coming.”

“There are still horse carriages at the west gate.” Xue Xiuzhuo suddenly turned around and strode a few steps across the rain to grasp Li Jianting tightly by the arm, “Your Majesty, Qudu is already beyond defending, but there’s still room to turn things around in Juexi!”

Li Jianting trembled slightly under the sounds of the troops fighting and killing. She grasped Xue Xiuzhuo back and said with a resolute and steely expression, “I shall defend the city gates together with Teacher.”

Xue Xiuzhuo gazed at Li Jianting. “When the sovereign is in danger or disgrace, his ministers ought to be ready to relinquish their lives to serve him.<sup>139</sup> There is no reason to make the emperor guard the gates when the ministers are still around.”

“I cannot abandon Teacher and flee.” Li Jianting’s voice was hoarse. Drenched in the rain with rainwater on her long eyelashes, she looked as if she was shedding tears. “Even if the city is breached, I ought to live and die with all of you.”

The hair on Xue Xiuzhuo’s temples was damp. He had changed too much in this one short year. He seized over the job of defending the old ways from Hai Liangyi’s hands. In the face of a disunited imperial court where everyone did their own thing, he had already done his best. The decline of the moderates started and ended with him. He wanted to accompany Dazhou on the final leg of its journey.

“With these words of Your Majesty, this humble subject has no more regrets.” Xue Xiuzhuo lifted his body and slowly straightened his robes and crown in the heavy rain. “This humble subject and Your Majesty were teacher and pupil once... so, let me walk this last leg of the road on your behalf.”

Li Jianting involuntarily choked with sobs.

An earth-shattering crash rang out at the last ramming at the main east gate. The gate, unable to withstand the impact of the force, opened up a narrow passage. The garrison troops had already thrust their blades in. The motley crew of soldiers and Capital Command Troops on the inside pushed against the gate panel. Tantai Hu led his soldiers and exerted himself to push and slide the city gate inward.

Xue Xiuzhuo turned around and waved his sleeves aside. "Escort Her Majesty out of the city!" He ordered loudly.

Li Jianting was unwilling to leave. The guards had already swarmed over to her. She gazed despondently at Xue Xiuzhuo in the rain. All the court ministers had their backs to her; no one looked back.

"Teacher..." She shouted.

Xue Xiuzhuo strode up the city stairs, his expression calm and composed under the deafening bombardment of the catapults. "Is Shen Zechuan around?" He asked outside the city.

Raindrops pelted upon armors. Feng Ta Shuang Yi cut a particularly conspicuous sight standing among them. Military flags flapped behind Shen Zechuan. He turned his head slightly towards Xue Xiuzhuo, as though he was observing this real opponent of his.

The front of Xue Xiuzhuo's clothes was wet from the rainwater, and the beast pattern on his mandarin square<sup>140</sup> was obscured. He did not wipe the rain on his face. Even at this moment, that stubbornness of his never diminished. He raised a hand to reveal the authority token he was holding.

"When I helped you become the Imperial Bodyguards' vice commander," Xue Xiuzhuo's eyes were calm, "I suspected you of being a Scorpion. I was wrong. You are far more terrifying than a Scorpion. Stride across that gate bearing Shen Wei's name now that you have returned to Qudu, and you'd be a sinner through the ages."

Raindrops trickled down the side of Shen Zechuan's face. His expression was sinister and ruthless, and his expressive eyes appeared particularly cold and detached. Finally, he spoke. "I have been a sinner ever since I stood before this gate. You cannot predict whether I'll live or die. If I can put up with being reviled by the masses today, I can shoulder the perpetual infamy for days to come."

The gale blew up Shen Zechuan's hair. His lips moved slowly, revealing an ominous, chilling smile in the torrential rain.

"Return me my teacher, my strategist, my elder brother. All of them."

The city gate fell over with a "thud". Tantai Hu led his men in a charge into the passageway. Pieces of the battlements went flying all over from being smashed by the rocks. Both gates within Qudu were breached. The Imperial Army and the Garrison Troops worked in concert together in the south and the east, battling to the death with the Capital Command Troops and the motley crew of soldiers on the various streets and alleys.

A broken piece of stone cut Xue Xiuzhuo on the cheek, and blood flowed unceasingly. Gripping his authority token tightly in his hand, all he could do was watch as the stone monument that was a symbol of Dazhou's dignity collapsed with a thunderous crash.

"You came to collect this debt, and I am willing to pay for it with my life." Xue Xiuzhuo suddenly said at the top of his voice in the burgeoning chaos, "I was the one who killed Qi Huilian and Yao Wenyu. Call it quits now! Where horses trample past fertile farmlands, the ravages of war spread. Shen Zechuan—I will give you my head!"

Tantai Hu cut down the soldier before him. As he lifted his blade, he noticed a familiar smell. He wiped away the blood on his face and flipped over the corpse of a soldier with his foot. For some inexplicable reason, he bent over and peeled away the other man's clothes.

Shen Zechuan did not reply. The strong crossbows at the top of the city wall suddenly unleashed a burst of arrow rain. Feng Ta Shuang Yi trod its hooves uneasily.

The sound of the rain was pressing. Fei Sheng's ears suddenly twitched, and his expression promptly underwent a change. He practically tumbled off the back of his horse and stomped on a garrison troop soldier's shield to spring into the air as he bellowed, "Master, watch out!"

Shen Zechuan had no cover before him. It seemed to Fei Sheng as if he could not make it in time when he suddenly saw Shen Zechuan slide open his folding fan in the rain to forcibly block the blow. But its bamboo body was too fragile, and in the next instant, it broke with a "crack".

However, this one move was already enough!

Unable to draw his blade, Fei Sheng grabbed hold of that sharp arrow with his bare hand and steadily landed on his feet in the blink of an eye.

"Do you know?" Fengquan held up his index finger and pointed it before him. "The smartest people are also the most foolish. They seemed to me to be having too hard of a time fighting with each other, so I set up an arena for them here."

Fengquan hoodwinked Qi Huilian, deceived Xue Xiuzhuo, and made a fool of Amu'er. He made all these talented and brilliant chess players fail miserably when they least expected it. His cunning ways were cloaked in invisibility, becoming a sharp blade that revealed none of its traces.

He was not subjected to anyone's manipulation.

“I shall be the one to toss the dice.” Fengquan spread his arms open and laughed softly in the empty Mingli Hall. “Whoever can step through the main gates of the palace alive today, will be the winner of this game.”

“Fuck...” Tantai Hu had already seen the tattoo on the corpse. He raised his head to look at the densely packed motley crew of soldiers ahead and felt his blood run cold.

He spat, “... This mixed bag of soldiers are all Scorpions!”

NOTICE:

New updated Character Chart from the QJJ Simplified CN Physical Copy!
Check out the Character Glossary!

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 四脚蛇 is also literally translated as “four-legged snake”, aka lizard.
2. 黃冊 Huangce or literally yellow registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household’s classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.
3. Youxiong is a tribe that takes the bear as its totem. The Biansha Tribes’ names are based on animals. For a list, you can refer to the worldmap.
4. Refer to 242
5. For those who forgot, refer to chapter 250, returning of the head to the Biansha Tribes is considered a humiliation of sorts.
6. 既然 jiran literally means “since”
7. 元气 or yuan qi, or primordial qi, or vital energy, is the fundamental qi we are born with.
8. Just a note that it actually said “mother” in the raws, not sure if it was an unintentional typo. As usual, will double check with the traditional chinese physical copy when it is released.
9. A practice in former times where two locks of hair from the husband and wife are bound together during the wedding as a symbol of lasting union.

10. 小师父 Little shifu, or Little (Venerable) Master, the shifu here is term of respect for a monk or nun and is not referring to Jiran as Qiao Tianya's martial art master.
11. 施主 shizhu, or benefactor, patron; term used by monks or nuns as a general term of address towards laymen; also used by Buddhist monks or Taoist priests for someone who has contributed to a monastery or temple.
12. This shifu here is legit his shifu lol. To distinguish between the shifu, we'll be using shifu for one's master and little (venerable) master as the monk address for Jiran.
13. “绿水无忧，因风而皱；青山不老，为雪白头① by Shen Yifu (沈义甫)
14. 因缘 in Buddhism, all things, phenomena, and social activities are believed arise out of the combinations of causes (因) and conditions (缘) (i.e., primary cause and secondary causes that combines to bring about a result, or effect (果). 因缘 also refers to predestined relationship or affinity.
15. “一切有为法，如梦幻泡影，如露亦如电，应作如是观。” from the Diamond Sutra 《金刚经》 Basically, all phenomena are fleeting and ephemeral, so we should treat them as such.
16. Refer to chapter 184
17. 向死而生 “being-towards-death”, a concept by German philosopher Martin Heidegger. According to Heidegger, the human being is a “being toward death” (Being and Time), one who cannot fully live an authentic life unless one confronts one's own mortality.
18. 相 in Buddhism at its most basic refers to form or appearance, etc of all things. Sort of mean how he still has an attachment to all things/phenomena/etc in the secular world and can't renounce the world just yet.
19. Refer to chapter 203
20. This is the mute lad mentioned in chapter 221, will use Ya'er (“mute lad”) as his name.
21. Having a son to carry on the family line is considered an act of filial piety in ancient times.
22. i.e., tom, dick, and harry
23. Does not refer to real descendants but the people under his “protection,” just like how Fengquan was Pan Rugui's god-grandson and Ji Lei was Pan Rugui's godson. So this eunuch has to be someone with high rank and power in the palace who can bring some benefit to his 'descendants', such as better treatment and opportunities, etc.

24. 老祖宗 literally old ancestor or forefather; sometimes the top eunuch in the Ming Dynasty is privately addressed as such

25. 太祖 Taizu, Great (Imperial) Ancestor ; usually the posthumous title of the first emperor (or founder) of a new dynasty.

26. Refers to Pan Rugui

27. 铁券 iron plaque, conferred by the emperor on a distinguished minister as a special honor. It is being used here as a "free-pass".

28. 军屯 military troops (mostly in border regions) who carry out garrison duties and farm crops to supply the border garrisons with grains.

29.

30. 杏眼 almond eyes; a kind of eye shape said to give off a younger, adorable or pure vibe.

31. 三姓家奴 literally, a slave with three surnames. The term originates from the Romance of the Three Kingdoms 《三国演义》 and refers specifically to Lu Bu. It's used mockingly to refer to capricious, disloyal and unrighteous people who serve traitors.

32. 治大国若烹小鲜 literally, ruling a large state is like cooking/steaming/boiling a small fish. Just as one should not turn small fish too frequently when cooking lest they break apart, the ruler of a big country should not make unpredictable changes in policy or otherwise interfere too much in the lives of the people, but instead should respect the natural order of society, from Tao Te Ching (Daodejing) 《道德经》 by Laozi

33. As offerings. The burning of offerings is considered an expression of filial piety to provide the deceased with the means to enjoy the comforts of what they once had when they were alive.
34. 旌旗十万斩阎罗<sup>①</sup> Original quote “此去泉台招旧部 旌旗十万斩阎罗。” “I shall head to the netherworld to summon my former [deceased] comrades and, with a banner of 10,000 [soldiers], slay the King of Hell (a reference to the Kuo//min//tang here)” from “The Three Chapters of Meiling” 《梅岭三章》 by Chen Yi (陈毅).
35. 斩阎罗 Zhan Yan Luo, aka, Slay(er of) the King of Hell
36. 年号 reign title a designation for the years when an emperor was on the throne
37. 盛胤 the name Shengyin would translate to “prosperity for posterity“.
38. It says Marquis of Bianbo in this chapter. Previously in earlier chapters, it was Marquis of Biansha, and then he got “promoted” to Earl of Biansha. Will double-check with the traditional Chinese copy when it is released.
39. 异姓王 Specifically princes, or lords, with different surnames from the imperial family These were conferred princes who were bestowed the title by the Emperor.
40. 三人成虎, literally three men make a tiger. i.e., three people spreading reports of a tiger would make one believe that there is really one around. Basically, a repeated rumor becomes a ‘fact’.
41. From here onwards, Li Jianting used “朕” (zhen) to refer to herself (unless stated otherwise). It’s an imperial term for “I” exclusively used by the Emperor. It differentiates the monarch from all his people and subjects.
42. 异姓王 Specifically princes, or lords, with different surnames from the imperial family. These were conferred princes who were bestowed the title by the Emperor.
43. * Li Jianting used the common “I” (我) here (marked with *), then reverted to the imperial “I” (朕) used exclusively by the emperor.
44. 君臣本同治乱，共安危 from “Essentials of Government in the Zhenguan Reign” 《贞观政要》 is a compendium on statecraft during the Zhenguan reign (627-649) in the Tang Dynasty.

45. 舌上有龙泉，杀人不见血 i.e., Words (of a sharp-tongued person) can do serious harm; from “Essentials of Government in the Zhenguan Reign” 《贞观政要》 is a compendium on statecraft during the Zhenguan reign (627-649) in the Tang Dynasty. Longquan refers to a city in southern Zhejiang province where famous Longquan swords are made.
46. 二叔 er'shu (for Xiao Chiye) vs. 二叔叔 er'shushu (for Shen Zechuan). 叔叔 as “uncle” refers to one’s father’s younger brother and is also a child’s form of address for any young man one generation older.
47. The full line, “以铜为镜，可以正衣冠；以史为镜，可以知兴替；以人为镜，可以明得失” by Tang Taizong (唐太宗); He who uses bronze as his mirror can tidy his apparel; He who uses history as a mirror can know of the rise and fall of a dynasty; he who uses people as his mirror can understand successes and failures.
48. 企者不立，跨者不行 from 《道德经》 Tao Te Ching (Daodejing) by Laozi
49. 清谈 Qingtan is a Chinese philosophical movement and social practice among political and intellectual elites where the literati engaged in highly sophisticated intellectual and philosophical discussions on lofty and non-mundane matters.
50. A variant of 天下英雄入吾彀中矣 “all heroes of the world have fallen into my trap” spoken by Tang Taizong in reference to the imperial examinations, which not only build a meritocratic government but also replace martial conflicts for civil examinations. The people, in voluntarily choosing to take the examinations, thus fall into Taizong’s “trap”, spending their lives dedicated to studying the classics (which instill precisely the values that keep the emperor in power) rather than rising in rebellions, etc.
51. His name means 延 (extend/prolong/engage) 清 (clear/pure/upright/impartial)
52. 太祖 Taizu, Great (Imperial) Ancestor “; usually the posthumous title of the first emperor (or founder) of a new dynasty.
53. 乱世用重典, Govern with severe punishments in turbulent times. i.e., the rulers should impose strict laws and inflict severe punishments in turbulent times, especially as a deterrent, from “Grand Pronouncements of Ming” (明大诰).

54. 份子钱 gift money that is given during occasions like weddings, birth of a child, etc
55. 清谈 Qingtán is a Chinese philosophical movement and social practice among political and intellectual elites where the literati engaged in highly sophisticated intellectual and philosophical discussions on lofty and non-mundane matters.
56. specifically elder sister and younger brother
57. 见字如晤 literally seeing this letter is akin to a meeting in person. It's commonly used in old times as an opening, sort of like "I hope this letter finds you well" in modern times.

- 58.
59. 团领衫 or 圆领袍 round-collared robe/attire typically worn by officials in the Ming Dynasty.
60. 亩, mu, or Chinese acre, measure of land equal to 0.0667 hectares
61. 掌中物 literally object in one's palm, also used to refer to being in one's control.

62. 沈腰潘鬓 shen yao pan bin (the ‘shen’ here is the same ‘shen’ in Shen Zechuan); refers to a man with a frail body and premature graying of hair.
63. 萧郎 Xiao-lang (the ‘xiao’ here is the same ‘xiao’ in Xiao Chiye); 郎 -lang, young man; a form of address that is also used as a term to address a lover or husband. So if your lover has the surname Zhang (张), you would be calling him Zhang-lang (zhanglang written in different characters btw, also means cockroach); 萧郎 Xiaolang as a whole also refers to a male lover or beloved in poetry.
64. Anitabha, or Amitabha, read with Jiran’s accent.
65. The official title is Tax Circuit Intendant, (督粮道) but it’s also a counterpart of Grain Tax Circuit (粮储道). Literally though, 督粮道 is “Grain-supervisory Circuit”.
66. Households were classified and recorded into the Huangce or yellow registers/yellow book (黄册) according to their occupation to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian (民户), military (军户), and craftsman.
67. 打肿脸(充胖子) slap one’s face until it’s swollen (in an effort to look imposing); to do something beyond one’s means in order to be impressive
68. 宝剑锋从磨砺出 The sharp edge of a treasured sword is the result of honing. i.e., one’s mettle or abilities have to be honed in order to become useful and outstanding
69. 车到山前必有路 i.e., things will always sort themselves out; cross the bridge when you come to it.

70.

71.

72. 独轮车 i.e., a kind of wheelbarrow

73. 都军 it is also used as another name for the Imperial Army during the Song Dynasty, but to make it less confusing, we'll use Capital Command Troops, aka troops in active service in the capital

74. 伯乐 a figure famed for his ability to judge the quality of horses. Refers to someone who is a good judge of talents.

75. 帝王之道：制衡之术 art of rulership/governance of ruler: The technique of checks and balances was one of the most common political tools used by the emperors in ancient China to govern their officials.

76.

77. 太师椅 Taishi Chair or Grand Preceptor Chair, is a classical style of a wooden armchair in ancient China.

78.

79. A form of hand exercise using a pair Baoding balls, designed to help relieve stress while building finger dexterity and wrist and forearm strength. We all know what you're thinking though. (° 5 °)

80.

81. 里 li, an ancient measure of length, 1 li is approx. 500m

82. 吴下阿蒙 General Lu Meng (from the Three Kingdoms Period) was originally uneducated, but he later devoted himself to studying for many years, becoming so knowledgeable and wise that he surprised Lu Su, who said to him, “You are no longer A-Meng from Wu”. Now used as a model of self-improvement through diligent study.

83. 水(至)清则无鱼 literally, water that is too clean has no(/few) fish, i.e., one should not demand absolute purity; you cannot expect everyone to be squeaky clean.

84. Chrysanthemums, which symbolize longevity, bloom around the ninth lunar month, also called “the month of chrysanthemum”. It is also customary to hold chrysanthemums appreciation sessions during the Double Ninth (Chongyang) Festival. Chrysanthemum is also one of the Four Gentlemen (along with plum, orchid, and bamboo) in Chinese art, which compares them to the Confucian junzi, or “gentlemen”.

85. 硕鼠 a large rat; a metaphor for a greedy official who levies and collects money.

86. 太宗 taizong, posthumous name given to second emperor of a dynasty

87. 木秀于林，风必摧之；堆出于岸，流必湍之 from “On Fortune And Destiny” 《运命论》 by Li Kang (李康). I.e., a person who is too outstanding will incur jealousy and is easily subjected to attacks and slanders.

88. 名帖 (also 拜帖), a name card (or visitation card) written on paper or wood used by officials, nobles, or distinguished people to notify the other party of their visit. It would usually indicate his name, position, and so on.

89. 天理 “Law/Principles of Heaven” i.e., feudal ethics as propounded by the Confucianists in the Song Dynasty

90. 任贤必治，任不贤必乱 (original line 任贤必治，任不肖必乱) from “Historical Events Retold as a Mirror for Government” 《资治通鉴》 compiled by Sima Guang.

91. 明者，销祸于未萌 from “Historical Events Retold as a Mirror for Government” 《资治通鉴》 compiled by Sima Guang.

92. 穷则思变 literally one will start thinking about changes when he is in extreme poverty (or when he hits rock bottom or is at the end of his resources).

93. Based on “君王死社稷” the sovereign die for the state from “The Books of Rites” 《礼记》

94. 物不极则不反，恶不极则不亡 from “Historical Events Retold as a Mirror for Government” 《资治通鉴》 compiled by Sima Guang.

95. 一春秋 also refers to a year

96. 招文袋 a small bag hung at the waist for keeping documents or money.

97. The first two characters for “moon over pines” (松月, literally pine moon) are the same characters for Qian Tianya’s name, Songyue.

98. The first two characters for “wind and spring” (风泉, literally wind spring) are the same characters as the name of the eunuch, Fengquan.

99. 松月生夜凉，风泉满清听 “Overnight at Master’s Mountain Lodge When Ding the Eldest (Ding Feng) Failed to Arrive” 《宿业师山房待丁大不至》 by Meng Haoran (孟浩然), a Tang dynasty poet.

100. 长生牌 Longevity tablet, a tablet used to pray for the blessings of one’s benefactors. (As opposed to ancestral tablets to pray to one’s dead ancestors.)

101. 批红 compilation of an endorsement on a memorial; chief eunuchs had the right to note down remarks in red color (pihong 批紅) on the incoming memorials, even before the Emperor had seen them.

102. 老祖宗, lao-zuzong or old/senior forefather/ancestor is also used to address the top eunuch. 小祖宗 xiao-zuzong or little/junior forefather/ancestor is also used as “little brat/little devil”.

103. 酷吏 specifically officials who used harsh laws or torture to brutalize the people.

104. It was Emperor Guangcheng in the jjwxc version but edited to Emperor Yongyi (after the name of his reign) in the simplified Chinese physical copy. As usual, the final copy will be double-checked against and based on the traditional Chinese physical copy when it is released. Please bear with us for now.

105. Specifically to retire after achieving success.

106. 纸贵 literally paper expensive. When a work is so popular everyone is copying it to circulate it, leading to paper shortage and causing the price of paper to skyrocket.

107. 黄册 Huangce or yellow registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household’s classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.

108. 火牌 military token/tally/seal or warrant to identify and authenticate soldiers delivering urgent messages.

109.急递铺 urgent delivery station or express post station. Together with the relay (post) stations, they formed the “arteries and veins” of the Ming Empire, working together to circulate people, information, and goods throughout the lands.

110.Supposedly, to repay the debt he owes his son in this life.

111.玉牒 literally jade records; i.e., genealogy record of the imperial family

112.朱批/朱砂印 literally vermilion or cinnabar seal as authentication

113.太祖 Taizu, Great (Imperial) Ancestor “; usually the posthumous title of the first emperor (or founder) of a new dynasty.

114.Yellow was the color of the emperor.

115.狼烟(台) specifically smoke of wolves’ dung burnt to indicate the presence of hostile forces

116.For those still confused, Li Jianting is the end result when Emperor Guangcheng forced himself on his daughter-in-law, aka Prince Qin’s wife, so if you were to really go into it, she’s both Emperor Guangcheng’s daughter and granddaughter.

117.水满则溢，月盈则缺。Water brims only to overflow, the moon waxes only to wane. i.e., things/situations reverse when they reach their extreme or limit.

118.异姓王 Specifically princes, or lords, with different surnames from the imperial family These were conferred princes who were bestowed the title by the Emperor, so naturally, they can be stripped of the title by the emperor too.

119.当头棒喝 literally, a blow to the head or a loud shout; i.e., a stern advice/criticism or a severe shock that brings one to a sudden realization of the error of one’s thinking/ways. From a traditional Chan (Zen) Buddhist teaching method where a monk would often hit a beginner student on the head or shout loudly at him to shock him out of his erroneous thinking and help him achieve enlightenment.

120.定海神针 literally “The Sea-Anchoring Divine Needle”.

According to the novel Journey to the West 《西游记》，this was a divine ‘needle’ (or pole) that could shrink and grow according to its owner’s wish. At first, it was a treasure of the Eastern Sea Dragon King’s Dragon Palace, but Sun Wukong (孙悟空) later took it away to use as his weapon and changed the needle’s name to the Ruyi

Golden Cudgel (如意金箍棒). It's used to refer to a stabilizing force.

121.长明灯 changming lamp (or literally eternally bright lamp), an altar lamp that is kept burning day and night usually set in front of a memorial tablet on the family's ancestral altar as a visible aspect of ancestor veneration.

122.纲常 i.e., the three cardinal ethical relationships of social order (including the relationship between the ruler and his subject, father and son, husband and wife) and the five constant virtues in Confucianism.

123.三姓家奴 literally, a slave with three surnames. The term originates from the Romance of the Three Kingdoms 《三国演义》 and refers specifically to Lu Bu. It's used mockingly to refer to capricious, disloyal and unrighteous people who serve traitors.

124.卖身契 more specifically, it's an indenture or a deed of sale of oneself or one's family member to someone else (e.g., into slavery, etc, or in Qiao Tianya's case, to repay a debt.)

125.For those interested in the actual characters in Chinese, Fuman wrote “风” which is the “feng” in “Fengquan”. Fengquan changed the “X”-like stroke into “杀”, or “sha”, which means kill.

126.A martial arts move where one hits an enemy from a distance away without actually laying hands on said person. i.e., to deal an indirect strike

127.Xiao Chiye literally said “old camel” (which is also a colloquial term for blockhead). Mengtuo has “camel” in the name. The Biansha Tribes' names are based on animals and/or nature. For a list, you can refer to Worldmap

128.A 母老虎 (Xiao Chiye used 悍虎 here) back at home usually refers to a man's wife who is a tigress or a shrew.

129.金帐 literally golden tent, refers to the tent the khan of ancient nomads lives in.

130.一把莲 During the Ming Dynasty, when the bedchamber doors were shut every night when the eunuchs of the inner palace scattered back to the duty room, the clothes they took off were always hung on the rack before their bed and scented with sweet perfumes

131.It was modified from 蝎子 (scorpion) to 鞋子 (shoes) here in the Simplified Chinese physical copy. Again, will KIV to double check with the Traditional Chinese copy.

132.

133. From 岳阳楼记 (Yueyang Tower) by Fan Zhongyan in Northern Song.

134. 攻城之法，为不得已 from the Art of War by Sun Tzu (孙子兵法)

135. Variant of 不在其位，不谋其政 (He who holds no rank in a state does not discuss its policies, or meddle not in affairs that are not part of your position) from the Analects (of Confucius). 论语·泰伯

136. 亩, mu, or Chinese acre, measure of land equal to 0.0667 hectares

137. In those days, it wasn't really proper for a man to have physical or close contact with a woman unrelated to him. (男女授受不亲). That's why he's doing the reading through a handkerchief so there's no skin contact, for propriety's sake.

138. 阿斗 A-Dou, the infant name of Liu Shan (刘禅), the last emperor of Shu Han (蜀汉), known for his lack of ability and weak character.

139. Refer to chapter 225 for a recap of Li Jianting And The Crack

140. 三教九流 the Three Doctrines (Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism) and the Nine Schools of Thought [i.e., Confucianism (儒家), Taoism (道教) and Buddhism (佛教); the Confucians (儒家), the Taoists (道家), the Yin-Yang (阴阳家), the Legalists (法家), the Logicians (名家), the Mohists (墨家), the Political Strategists (纵横

家), the Eclectics (杂家) and the Agriculturists (农家)]; also used to describe people in various trades; people of all sorts

141.

142.单梢炮 Single-component catapults, or one-branch trebuchet

143.丈 zhang; a measure of length, 1 zhang = ten Chinese feet (3.3m)

144.及冠 or 弱冠, a man's 20th birthday, i.e., coming of age at 20 for a male.

145.主辱臣死 often used as an expression of loyalty from a subject to the emperor.

补子 | 黄雀文

146.

147. 补子 rank badges or mandarin squares, was a large embroidered badge sewn onto the surcoat of an official to indicate the rank of the official wearing it.

CHAPTER 280: EXILED

Xiao Chiye woke up from his sleep.

His arms, which he had rested his head on, had gone numb. He opened his eyes and stared at the tent for a while. He thought he had dreamt of the heavy downpour in Qudu.

Lu Guangbai lifted the tent flap and entered. Standing at the entrance wiping the damp sweat on his nape with a handkerchief, he said, “The falcons on patrol discovered saker falcons in the areas towards the east. Gu Jin also found traces of passage from a horse caravan there. They are the convoy squad from the Hulu Tribe.” He set the handkerchief back into the copper basin to rinse it. “Amu’er refused to surrender. He means to fight to the death.”

Xiao Chiye stood up and bent his leg to prop up an arm. “It’s nearing winter. The Hulu Tribe can’t graze sheep. This is the last of their food.”

“Amu’er’s insistence on not making an appearance is because he’s conserving his strength. He has seen through your intention to wait for him to play into your hand.” Lu Guangbai hung up the handkerchief. “He’s stalling for time.”

The Hulu Tribe had exhausted their entire tribe’s energy to supply Hasen, and now they are supplying their entire tribe’s provisions to Amu’er. They would have to slaughter their own cattle and sheep if they wanted to survive this harsh winter. Amu’er was already a spent force, like an arrow at the end of its flight, so what was he still waiting for?

With the tent flap at the entrance rolled up, Xiao Chiye stood up and bent over slightly to make his way out of the tent. He looked out at the endless sand dunes. Meng flew down from the flagpole and landed on the right arm Xiao Chiye had raised.

“Amu’er is a fine general,” Xiao Chiye said, “but he’s an even better politician.”

Amu’er was a master at keeping the enemy in check. He opened up the North-South battlefield and formed the Black and White Scorpions all to better contain the enemy. He was already old and could no longer be as valiant as Hasen on the battlefields, but that did not mean that he was helpless in the face of Xiao Chiye. Now that the game was as good as lost for him, there was only one way he could make Xiao Chiye withdraw his troops, and that was, to first crush Xiao Chiye’s backing, Shen Zechuan.

The expression in Xiao Chiye’s eyes was sharp and cutting as he looked back at Lu Guangbai and said, “He’s waiting for news from Qudu.”

Tantai Hu seemed to have stirred up a hornet’s nest with his words. Before he could dodge, his bun was slashed off by a scimitar that popped out. His black hair scattered apart, shortened by a large portion, and with the middle nearly bald!

“Motherfucker.” Tantai Hu grabbed up a handful of his short hair. “Colluding from the inside-out. The real traitorous bastards are here!”

Raindrops splashed up along with the edges of the blades. Countless soldiers held their blades level before them and barged over to ram against each other’s armors in the passageway. With a burst of strength, they advanced. Few of the motley crew of soldiers brought along their scimitars. This weapon was too conspicuous, so majority of them opted to carry their piked daggers beside their equipped blades.

“The city gates have already been breached.” Shen Zechuan promptly came to a decision and snapped his folding fan shut. “Tell Shenwei that there are people from Biansha hiding in Qudu. We have to enter even if we aren’t inclined to.”

Fei Sheng did not dare to tarry. He threw away the sharp arrows and pointed out the incoming path to his subordinate at the same time he got on his horse. “Pass on His Lordship’s order—”

Cen Yu still had yet to lead the students back into the city when he saw someone ahead galloping into the camp and shouted towards the military tent, “There are Biansha soldiers hiding in Qudu. The lives of the masses are at stake. Gao Zhongxiong, receive your orders!”

Gao Zhongxiong suddenly pushed aside the clutter of paper and grabbed his brush. Under the urgent sound of the torrential rain, he dipped the brush into the ink and waited with bated breath and rapt attention.

“Heaven is helping His Lordship.” Yao Wenyu coughed at the window. As he gasped lightly for breath, he propped himself up and said to Gao Zhongxiong, “This move by Qudu is tantamount to committing suicide. Shen Wei’s reputation as the national traitor can be relinquished to someone more worthy now. Shenwei, His Lordship is telling you to tell the world that the internal scourge is in Qudu.”

The timing of the Scorpions’ arrival was simply too perfect. Just like Shao Chengbi who previously mobilized his troops rashly, it gave Shen Zechuan sufficient reason. The garrison troops could not kill living people when they attacked their way into the city, and it was tricky trying to deal with tens of thousands of a motley crew of soldiers, but once these soldiers turned into the Scorpions, they were foreign foes!

“The foreign enemies stand before us, and the city gates have been breached. It’s Heaven’s will that a wise, enlightened sovereign with just cause should come spurring his horse on!” Yao Wenyu covered his mouth, choking a few times as he coughed. Eventually, he held on to the edge of the bed for support and laughed out loud with some difficulty. “The pawn who enters the game on the imperial court acts not of his own volition. The Grand Mentor is truly remarkable. We’ll gladly accept this Blade of Regicide, Fengquan.” He raised his moist eyes and said in a hoarse voice as he looked at the heavy rain, “Xue Yanqing has lost!”

Xue Xiuzhuo won a game in the rainstorm and killed Qi Huilian, ousted Yao Wenyu, as well as drove Hai Liangyi to his death. However, he was similarly constrained by the chess pieces. Lu Guangbai rebelled, Xiao Chiye returned to his wolf pack, and Shen Zechuan stabilized and secured his hold on Zhongbo. The so-called foolproof planning was all an illusion. He was forced to the brink of the precipice by his own self! He went to great lengths to find the Scorpions, but he never expected the Scorpions to be right beside him.

Qi Huilian had suffered an unexpected setback before. Fengquan could not understand. The intelligent ones would never repeat the same mistakes. The Crown Prince met his defeat at the hands of a traitor, so Qi Huilian would never let Shen Zechuan fail again at the hands of a mole. The Eastern Palace had so many subordinates, so why did Qi Huilian have to choose the Shao and Qiao clans?

Because they were too conscience-stricken.

Compared to the others who had been doing their best for the Eastern Palace from start to end, Shao Chengbi was that “dead knot”. He had never done a misdeed when he was under the Ministry of War, but because he was a sentimental man who greatly valued ties, he let his private affairs get in the way of his official duties. He bent over backward to save the Qiao clan, but Qiao Kanghai still died. He betrayed his former master of the Eastern Palace, yet he failed to save a single person and even lost his son in the process. This was just the beginning. At the very moment the case of the Zhongbo troops’ defeat broke out, Shao Chengbi made his own prison, becoming a prisoner of the words “conscience” forever and ever.

This blood debt surpassed all of Shao Chengbi’s personal relationships, and for that reason, he could blind his own eyes, render himself a mute with poison, and give his own son out. He kneeled before the Buddha statue and wept bitter tears, but Qi Huilian did not use him.

This was the most ruthless and most brilliant thing about Qi Huilian.

When the Grand Mentor was alive, he did not use Shao Chengbi, and for every day that passed after his death, Shao Chengbi would fall even deeper into agony. This agony and guilt spurred on Shao Chengbi, and in turn, Shao Chengbi similarly spurred on Fengquan. Fengquan struggled to survive in the crack in which he had fallen. No matter whose pawn he was, Qi Huilian dared to bet the shackles he had on him on the word “father”. Shao Chengbi was Fengquan’s lock, dead or alive. At that moment Fengquan bade Shao Chengbi farewell, he had the razor pressed against the side of Shao Chengbi’s neck, but he never did make the killing move.

Xue Xiuzhuo regarded people as his pawns, and Qi Huilian treated his pawns as people. He taught and guided Shen Zechuan in the art of political power checks and balances back at Zhaozui Temple, controlling all weaknesses with the word “feelings”.

Shen Zechuan opened his eyes and saw the end of the main east gate.

Amid the curtain of rain and snow, indistinct scenes of the past played out.

Qi Huilian’s figure still seemed to be standing there, his arms held high as he pulled on the chains, refusing to look back at Shen Zechuan even in his last moments when he tilted his head back and shouted.

Lanzhou.

Don’t be afraid.

Shen Zechuan closed his eyes. When he opened them again, Feng Ta Shuang Yi suddenly charged forth. Shen Zechuan's sleeves and robes billowed amid the pelting of the frost and snow, driving the blistering wind on both sides. He was like the icy glint of a blade about to return to its sheath among the dark clouds, bound to pierce through Heaven and Earth at this moment.

He who has just cause<sup>122</sup> is justified!

The sudden thunderclap seemed to explode against his scalp. Luo Mu had already lost control over the motley crew of soldiers. He hastily retreated amid the chaos of soldiers and shouted to the officials, "... The troops have turned renegade!"

The rain and snow were blinding. Xue Xiuzhuo could not stand steady on his feet. He stood atop the city wall with the court officials and watched as Shen Zechuan took the lead. The morale of the garrison troops was at an all-time high as they followed that figure in white forward, their momentum unstoppable! The Imperial Army at the south side gate encountered the Capital Command Troops. They knew the alleyways of Qudu even better than the Capital Command Troops did, and when it came to fighting on the streets here, they were unrivaled.

Blood splattered on the walls. Tavern banners and random booths tumbled over the ground along with the fighting and killing.

Shen Zechuan urged his horse into the passageway, and stomped open the main gate of Qudu from the front just as he wanted. At his side, Fei Sheng raised the Zhongbo banner up high, while the garrison troops braved the rain of arrows from the top of the city wall and crossed into the territory one after another.

"The city is breached—!" A shrill, miserable wail rang out from the front of the Imperial College entrance. Following right after, several thousands of students cried aloud in unison amidst the spray of broken ice.

Kong Qiu staggered forward, holding on to the battlement for support as he wept, "Oh, the hundred-year reign of Dazhou..."

The bronze bell at the summit of Mount Bodhi rang with a clang. The long, drawn-out toll of the bell stirred up a wave of wind, startling away the birds among the overlapping clouds. The city gate fell over with a thunderous crash. Countless denunciations and declarations of war tumbled in the air.

Both of Xue Xiuzhuo's cheeks were wet and cold. He looked up at the overcast clouds. The burden that had been imposed upon his shoulders all this time went up in smoke along with the collapse of the city gates. He raised his hand to wipe away the rainwater on his cheeks, having already heard the cries that had risen all around him.

It has all come to an end.

Xue Xiuzhuo's eyes were like deadly still pools of deep water as he silently threw away his authority token. That token etched with the golden glory of the Li clan fell to the ground, where the hooves of horses passing by trampled it into pieces that tumbled separately into the puddles of mud.

Tantai Hu held up against the scimitar and pushed his opponent back into a retreat amid a flurry of footsteps. He abruptly swung his blade in a diagonal slash, and the sharp edge chafed against the scimitar and sliced off the other party's fingers. Tantai Hu kicked over the other man and brandished his blade to split open a path paved in blood for Shen Zechuan.

"Slay the enemies!" He shouted himself hoarse.

The blade of Qiao Tianya's sword pressed against the pulps of his fingers. The rain outside the hall was still falling, but the wind had since stopped. Sheer white gauzes hung down to the ground. The small puddle at his feet reflected glints of the sword's edge.

Fengquan raised his finger and pushed over that last lamp. The opening of his sleeves brushed against that slightly bright flame. "You've become Shen Zechuan's blade, and now you're going to kill me."

The lock of hair over Qiao Tianya's forehead hung down and blocked out the view of his eyes.

He did not know if Fengquan was crying or laughing, but the latter's shoulders shook as he hid in the darkness and clapped his palms lightly.

Water droplets dripped along the lock of Qiao Tianya's hair onto the bridge of his nose. His sword was so fast that it left its sheath in the twinkling of an eye. At the first flash of the sword glint, the "clang" of metal against metal rang out as the sword struck away the iron needles that had come hurtling towards him.

The clothes and hat official stood behind the white gauze and raised an arm to pull off the hat on his head. There was only the sound of Fengquan cackling in Mingli Hall. The clothes and hat official who had soundlessly materialized was just like a wraith locking eyes with Qiao Tianya across the white gauzes.

The water droplet made a soft “plop” sound as it dropped to the ground.

Qiao Tianya had already sprung up like a leopard flying into a sudden rage. All his unwillingness to take it lying down dissolved into the blade of the sword as it slashed through the sheer white gauzes and thrust forth with such force that the clothes and hat official retreated swiftly.

The clothes and hat official hid his trump card in his narrow sleeves. As he raised his fingers, several silver threads lashed out in unison and nailed into the vermillion pillar while Qiao Tianya was dodging them. The man then kicked himself off the ground and flipped into the air, taking advantage of the silver threads to move as light as a swallow.

Lamp oil dripped onto the ground, and the tongues of the flame licked the floor, blazing as they chased after Fengquan’s sleeves and robes.

Even if the Garrison Troops did not kill the commoners, the commoners still fled in all directions in the pandemonium. The streets were so chaotic that Tantai Hu pushed and shoved against the commoners, fearing that the Scorpions would take advantage of the situation and fish in troubled waters.

“Disperse the people!” Tantai Hu’s palms were slick with blood. It was so slippery he could not hold his blade.

But it was too late. The people blocking the streets crashed into the formation of Scorpions. It was so dark, they could hardly make out who the other party was. The Scorpions, with scimitars in hand, killed the people and lifted the head to say in fluent Dazhou tongue, “His Lordship said, slaughter everyone in Qudu!”

Fei Sheng lifted his torch and shouted as he galloped, “The Biansha Baldies have infiltrated the city. Luo Mu’s soldiers are, in fact, rebels! Run if you don’t want to die!”

Where in the world would the panicking common folks on the road hear Fei Sheng’s voice? They crowded and jostled before the Scorpions, and after people dropped dead, they turned around and swarmed towards the Garrison Troops. This street was not spacious enough, and a battering ram that had fallen over behind was also blocking the path. The swarming of the rushing crowd threw the Garrison Troops’ formation into disarray.

The Scorpions were not wearing armor. They blended in with the common people running all over, and when they passed by the Garrison Troops, they unexpectedly threw out stabs. Over ten of the Garrison Troops in front who were caught off guard promptly fell over.

“The Zhongbo rebels are killing people!”

The commoners who cut a sorry sight fleeing for their lives covered their faces and wailed, trapped as they were with no way to advance or retreat. Under the overlapping shadows, they mistook the Scorpions for the Garrison Troops, mistakenly thinking they were already surrounded by the Garrison Troops. For a moment, deafening cries reverberated through the sky.

What a headache!

Fei Sheng turned his horse around and returned to Shen Zechuan’s side. “Master, what should we do? Several main roads are all blocked!”

It was dark now. Banners on fire everywhere burned in mid-air. The rain abated some, and those snowflakes also turned cotton-like and foam-like.

Shen Zechuan held the reins and looked towards the city wall. “Light up the watchtower. Force open the gate and sound the alarm. Have the Imperial Army who broke through the south side gate open up the street entrances.”

The Garrison Troops on both sides swiftly passed through. The arrows among the battlements were running low, and there were combats at close quarters everywhere at the foot of the city. The torches of the Garrison Troops abruptly lit up. Seizing the watchtower had become especially important.

Shen Zechuan carried a short blade on him. When his horse passed through the crowd, a gust of wind materialized at the side. He instantly dodged, and a piked dagger suddenly swiped past the side of his cheek. The wind trailing in its wake brushed against his cheek, carrying with it a slight chill.

Shen Zechuan’s short blade suddenly left its sheath, and with a spin of his left hand, he struck away the piked dagger with a “thud”. However, his wounds had yet to heal, and this one blow merely knocked the Scorpion’s piked dagger askew. The Scorpion promptly released his grip, and when the piked dagger dropped, he back-handedly grabbed it and thrust it horizontally at Shen Zechuan’s neck.

The banner overhead suddenly burst into flames. Ashes all over the sky danced around his head. At the instant the banner burned, Shen Zechuan flipped off his horse. Feng Ta Shuang Yi got his intent and started running. Having already evaded the horizontal thrust, Shen Zechuan feigned a few leaps with Feng Ta Shuang Yi. The Scorpion grabbed onto empty air. In the brief moment he was disoriented, Shen Zechuan grabbed hold of the arm he had hit out with.

The Scorpion was stunned. Delight followed soon after, and he exclaimed in the Biansha tongue, "He has no strength—"

He had yet to finish his words when Shen Zechuan released his hand. His left hand struck hard along the side of the Scorpion's arm. The Scorpion thought Shen Zechuan was going to fling him over his shoulder, so he promptly spread a leg and prepared to stabilize his lower body, but Shen Zechuan unexpectedly whirled around and kicked him right on the chest.

The Scorpion spread both arms and said in a booming voice, "Overrating your own strength like an ant trying to shake a tree!"

Two of Shen Zechuan's long, slender fingers went aiming at an angle towards the center of the Scorpion's brows. The Scorpion suspected a trap and immediately closed his eyes. Shen Zechuan, however, let out a very soft laugh. His short blade that had slipped from his hand fell downward. Putting his weight on one leg, he whirled around again and kicked the blade sideways at the Scorpion. The Scorpion, caught unprepared, took the short blade right in his lower abdomen. As a spray of blood splatter, he let loose a blood-curdling scream.

Shen Zechuan turned a deaf ear to it. The flame behind him abruptly flared bright. His figure elongated along with the movement of the blaze.

Seeing his opportunity, Fei Sheng bellowed, "Luo Mu colluded with the Biansha people, and the foreign enemies are now in the city. The Garrison Troops are killing the enemies. The rest of you, get out of the way quickly!"

The torches on the watchtower at the east gate swayed against the sky. The Garrison Troop soldiers stepping on the railings held up their Zhongbo authority token and shouted downward with all their might, "By order of His Lordship—Kill the foreign enemies. Kill the rebels. Kill the traitors!"

Seeing as their incitement was useless and that the passageways were all blocked tight by the Garrison Troops, the Scorpions could only retreat to their original path. There was complete pandemonium in the entire Qudu, and a total bloodbath ensued as the Capital Command Troops, who were still fighting to the death making a last-ditch defense of the city gate, were slain by the Imperial Army.

Most of the battlements had already collapsed. Xue Xiuzhuo's official robe was badly shredded, and he cut a sorry sight until someone yanked him hard in an attempt to move him.

Ya'er was holding Jin-ge'er by the hand, and he had a cloth bundle slung over his shoulder. He gestured to Xue Xiuzhuo in the din, making "ah, ah" sounds while dragging him towards the steps.

Xue Xiuzhuo staggered a few steps. He braced himself against the wall and looked at Jin-ge'er. Jin-ge'er was Xue Xiuyi's son, whom Xue Xiuzhuo had kept by his side to raise. At present, the boy was so frightened that his face was awash in tears, yet he still held on to the corner of Xue Xiuzhuo's clothes and cried out as he held his tears back, "Uncle, uncle, uncle!"

Ya'er stomped his foot anxiously and kept tugging at Xue Xiuzhuo's official robe and motioning for Xue Xiuzhuo to run.

Xue Xiuzhuo raised his hand to stroke Jin-ge'er's cheek. "You're a good child," he said.

Jin-ge'er raised his head, feeling the rain on his cheeks.

Xue Xiuzhuo hunched over and turned his back to the light, concealing all of his weaknesses. He only had this brief moment of interlude in this entire life of his. It was as if this was the only moment that belonged to him.

Ya'er unwarrantedly started to cry. He shouted "AH" at Xue Xiuzhuo with all the strength he could muster and tugged at the latter until his fingers were all red.

Xue Xiuzhuo straightened up again and gently broke himself free of Ya'er's hold on him. He gave Ya'er a push on his shoulder and said, "Leave, both of you."

Jin-ge'er sobbed loudly and shouted as he pulled at Xue Xiuzhuo, "Uncle!"

Xue Xiuzhuo paid no heed to him.

The rain tonight was less heavy than it was two years ago, but he saw the same dark and bleak sky. The lone traveler guarded the city. Long before the daylight was wiped off, he had heard the echoes of decay, but he really could not take it lying down. The behemoth that once towered here was going to take its leave of the stage in such a lonesome way.

Xue Xiuzhuo slowly made his way down the steps. He walked in solitude, never looking back even once.

“So it’s to Yuanzhuo’s credit,” Xue Xiuzhuo halted in his tracks and said to Shen Zechuan, “that you pushed hard for the census registries in Zhongbo.”

Shen Zechuan did not answer.

In the dim shadows, Xue Xiuzhuo brushed off the dust on his sleeves. “I held Qi Huilian in high esteem and embarked on the path he took.” He gazed at Shen Zechuan. “But I wasn’t as ruthless as him.”

It was all too easy to gamble on a life. The hard part was in daring to stake this life on the game. Qi Huilian dared to do anything, and the driving force behind his insane actions was his trust in Shen Zechuan.

Lanzhou was not his pawn.

And it was precisely because of this that Qi Huilian left nothing behind for Lanzhou. Shen Zechuan did not need restraints. Qi Huilian brushed the top of his hair before.<sup>123</sup> In those five years of being together day and night, he had already pointed out the direction clearly for Lanzhou.

Teacher shall teach you the classics, and bestow upon you the courtesy name Lanzhou.

This was everything Qi Huilian had.

“Dazhou has been through the era of the heroes. For hundreds of years, even the foreign powers have not been able to breach through this gate, and now, it’s lost to you.” Xue Xiuzhuo gazed at Shen Zechuan. “A person whose fate is sealed, much like a fish swimming at the bottom of the cauldron.”

“I have heard plenty of speculations, and even Yuanzhuo has fantasized that I was perhaps a descendent with the Li’s bloodline that Shen Wei kept hidden.” Shen Zechuan turned his eyes to look at the palace. “But I am the son of a subject guilty of a crime. The whole world scrambles over one another for the imperial heir. Only Mister did the exact opposite.”

He who has just cause is not preordained by Heaven.

“Qi Huilian turned the tides with his own strength, and for that, I admire him.” Xue Xiuzhuo exhaled deeply and continued in a heavy voice, “My sovereign is young, and so it is I, Xue Xiuzhuo, who has come to surrender today. The city gates are already breached, and the public roads, opened. Shen Zechuan, do not kill the innocents—I will come to receive you!”

His voice was like a clap of thunder so sudden and deafening that the officials at the top of the city wall were all paralyzed. Opening the gates to surrender was a humiliation and a disgrace for all eternity, and now, he, Xue Yanqing, alone had shouldered it!

“No...” Kong Qiu cried out in anguish and beat his chest in sorrow, “Oh, Dazhou...”

The court officials mutually held each other in support in inconsolable grief, as if mourning the loss of a parent.

A surrender meant that the war would cease. The remaining garrison troops of Zhongbo no longer need to advance further. The fact that the thirteen cities of Juexi behind Qudu could still remain unharmed even though Qudu was breached was a testament to the painstaking effort of the practical doers' faction over several years.

They were also the last remaining granary of Dazhou.

Kong Qiu understood. This was the last wise policy. They were completely wiped out in this game of chess with Zhongbo, and with this one reception by Xue Xiuzhuo, Dazhou would thus cease to exist.

Kong Qiu was about to sag to the ground. He clung on to the battlement, his aged face awash in tears. “The change of sovereignty today is all down to our incompetence.” He tilted his head back to look at the flurry of cotton snow in the sky tangling with the official denunciation and declaration of war. Gradually, a resolute expression came over his face.

Shen Zechuan knew it did not bode well on seeing the change in Kong Qiu's expression.

The dark, gloomy canopy of the heavens covered up the clouds and moon from view. Raindrops tumbled and splashed.

Sure enough, Kong Qiu held his head high and bellowed, “I am a subject of Dazhou, and I will not kneel to a second master!”

With that, his official robe fluttered, and he made to leap off the city wall to die for his nation.

Oh no, Fei Sheng inwardly cursed in alarm. Xue Xiuzhuo might have surrendered and received the new sovereign, but he still had yet to hand over the Dazhou imperial jade seal. If the news of Kong Qiu's jump were to spread to tomorrow, the narrative would be twisted such that Shen Zechuan was the one who forced him into doing so!

“Stop him!” Fei Sheng shouted to the garrison troops who had attacked their way up the city wall.

The officials crowded around Kong Qiu. No matter how fast the garrison troops were, they could not push away the crowd. All they saw was Kong Qiu's official robe billowing in the wind. His body was already leaning over the battlement. Right at this critical juncture, a figure suddenly pounced from behind and grabbed hold of Kong Qiu's official robe.

"Grand Secretary, you mustn't!" Liang Cuishan cried out involuntarily.

Kong Qiu's figure lurched to a pause, chafing off the broken bricks on the top of the city wall. He held his arms and started coughing in between wails.

Liang Cuishan was sweating buckets as he dragged Kong Qiu back. Both of his arms were trembling. He was badly shaken, and his face, through the dark night and flames, was drenched in sweat.

The horse carriage was attacked on its way to the main west gate. All the various street entrances were packed with carriages and horses. The rich and noble packed up their possessions, wanting to make use of the chaos to make their escape through the main west gate, thus completely blocking this particular road.

The guards pulled the reins and brandished their whips to chase away the commoners, bellowing, "Move away! Get out of the way!"

The carriages and horses at the side came barging over, and startled shouts of alarm promptly rose. There were so many people it was like a mush of mixed gruel in a pot; there was no way the horse carriage could get any closer.

The curtain of the carriage swayed. Li Jianting saw the towering palace and heard the toll of the bronze bell.

"The city's been breached," Han Jin ran barefoot through the streets. He jumped and grabbed at the declarations fluttering all over in the air and burst out laughing like a deranged man. "The city's been breached!"

"Xue Xiuzhuo surrendered." Someone cried bitterly with his head to the sky. "Dazhou has perished!"

Li Jianting felt an acute stab of pain in her chest. Her trembling fingers lifted the carriage curtain open. Amid her urgent gasps for breath, she suddenly leaned forward and started throwing up. The strong wind blew against her disheveled hair, and the drizzle masked her face. Bones indistinctly protruded from her heaving back.

The last leg of the journey Xue Xiuzhuo spoke of was to suffer the humiliation on her behalf.

Li Jianting's body also started trembling. The chill penetrated deep into her bones, and she laughed in a raspy voice. She and Xue Xiuzhuo mutually complemented each other, but they did not have even a smidgen of teacher-pupil bond. Xue Xiuzhuo had no need for it, and so did Li Jianting. Even to this moment, Xue Xiuzhuo was still doing what he was as a "subject".

Jiang Qingshan did not return, so even if Li Jianting fled to Juexi, she would merely be struggling to drag out an ignoble existence. Dazhou had already perished. Shen Zechuan not only possessed a powerful army but also public trust. All the painstaking efforts they had made in the eight cities were handed over on a silver platter to Shen Zechuan. Those unfinished matters they had yet to work on would, after tonight, become Shen Zechuan's badges of honor.

"Dragging out an ignoble existence for the remainder of my life, fleeing and hiding left and right." Li Jianting raised her eyes and looked at the rain. "... How dull."

Li Jianting had spent half of her life "hiding". Her fate was that of a life which could never see the light. But she did her utmost to struggle. She knew where she stood among the victors and the losers.

She was defeated, and to that, she conceded.

"Your Maj—" The guard could not maintain his grip on the reins as he watched Li Jianting leap off.

Soaking in the rain, Li Jianting lifted her arm to tie up her loose hair. Tens of thousands of people were fleeing to the west. Only she alone headed east, becoming the lone figure going against the current of the tide of people.

Han Jin grasped the declaration in his hand as he danced and sang merrily among the tidal surge of people. He pranced joyfully and caught up with Li Jianting.

He grinned, "I'm looking for my eldest brother!"

Mingli Hall blazed with flames.

Li Jianting bent over and picked up a broken drum that had fallen on the road. She tapped it, and the muffled beats of the drum rang out.

"Going to the palace?"

Han Jin clapped his hands. "Yes, yes, yes!"

Troops thrown into disarray fought desperately to the death. Li Jianting no longer looked at anyone. She struck that broken drum and laughed out loud without a care together with the madman, striding in the direction of the palace as she raised her voice.

“Exiled subject I was of yesteryear, a hero too in a turbulent era. Of the learned the sage beckons, into my trap the talented walk.”<sup>124</sup>

Amid the backdrop of the bleak, lightless sky, Kong Qiu and the other court officials shed tears atop the city wall.

“Hark, the nomad flutes<sup>125</sup> at the pass of Xiao,<sup>126</sup> there goes armored hooves through waters cold. Into war the veteran general spurs his horse, his military gear heavy in the blizzard storm.”

At the stone monument of Libei that had stood erect for a spring and an autumn, a thin veil of snow blanketed Xiao Fangxu’s saber. Among the withered grass, the armored cavalry galloped. Xiao Jiming dismounted his horse and lowered his hand to wipe away the remnants of snow for the blade.

“Where mountain snow meets starburst glints, of rapacious eagles, the ruthless wolf slays.”<sup>127</sup>

The billowing waves of the Chashi River churned, as the withered flower of Chiti vanished under the long stream of current.

“Blade thus sheathed, he dusts his sleeves, scarlet tassel stark against clouds carefree. With his wine, the ailing immortal roams. Moon over pines, still of zither strings.”

Yao Wenyu leaned over and coughed, and once again, his handkerchief was stained red with blood. He gazed out of the tent, his vision obstructed by the heavy fog.

Qiao Tianya’s sword had already returned to its sheath. Amidst the fire and the pounding of the rain, he looked at Fengquan.

“In the ceremonial hall<sup>128</sup> the merry feast starts, cups and chopsticks clink,<sup>129</sup> we toast and drink.”

Li Jianting struck the broken drum as she threaded her way within the vermilion city walls.

“Relish the wine to the last of its drop, of revelry we indulged within lofty palace walls.”

The fire in Mingli Hall soared into the sky, brightly illuminating the surroundings. A blazing sea of flames lay right ahead. Han Jin ran with his arms raised, while Li Jianting turned her head back to take another look at Qudu. Her fingers tapped lightly against the drum, but the drum no longer made a sound. She looked to be in a trance amid the raging flames as she finished in a hoarse voice, "... Intoxicated we fall amidst rapturous songs... where honor and rank need matter not..."

The lacquered pillars of Mingli Hall collapsed with a thunderous crash and splashed forth a wave of fire. The ambers splatter onto the hem of Li Jianting's skirt and burn along the decorative patterns.

She turned around, and the raging fire engulfed her whole.

CHAPTER 281: WOLF & EAGLE

When dawn broke, the sound of killing in the city had already stopped. As it had just rained, there were no ashes and dust floating in the air. More than half of the palace was burned down. Shen Zechuan stepped over the ruins; all he could see were crumbling walls and debris.

“Arson within the palace,” Fei Sheng lamented as he followed at Shen Zechuan’s side. “... Mingli Hall was burned to ashes.”

“The female emperor did not surrender and gave her life for her country,” Shen Zechuan said. “The name Emperor Shengyin ought to be on the annals of Dazhou.”

Fei Sheng had been longing to return to Qudu, and now that he had really returned, the sights he saw everywhere were all unfamiliar. It was not as exhilarating as it was in Zhongbo. He held his blade and pushed aside the rubble ahead for Shen Zechuan. “She was a woman of integrity and principles.”

“Tell Youjing, Minshen, and Chengfeng to standby for the order.” Shen Zechuan stopped in his tracks. “Songyue didn’t return?”

Fei Sheng looked in the direction of Mingli Hall and answered after a moment of hesitation. “... He’s back.”

Qiao Tianya was in the midst of washing his hands. His ten fingers were submerged in the copper basin, dispersing wispy tendrils of red in the water. His sword was still by the side of his waist, but its hilt was so red all over that its original color could not be made out.

“The Scorpions in the various areas have already been executed. There are a total of a hundred and forty-seven people, with the majority being eunuchs.” Ge Qingqing flipped through the eunuchs’ authority tokens. “The leader is Fengquan, who came to take Pan Rugui’s place after the eighth year of the reign of Xiande.”

“That’s a lot,” Zhou Gui said with horror.

Seeing Zhou Gui’s face go pale, Ge Qingqing could not help but comfort him. “Qudu is already surrounded by us now. Your Excellency doesn’t have to worry.”

While they were speaking, Qiao Tianya had already washed his hands clean. He lifted the hanging screen at the door and went down the steps while the sky was still not fully bright.

“If Fengquan could be captured alive...”

Kong Ling soundlessly waved his hand, and Yu Xiaozai did not go on with his words. Looking at the still swinging hanging screen, Kong Ling whispered, “Report it as is to His Lordship.”

Before Qiao Tianya made his way to the tent, he heard Yao Wenyu coughing. He stood at the entrance and raised his hand, but he did not lift the tent flap.

Yao Wenyu folded the handkerchief, put it back into his sleeves, and said in an unhurried voice, “His Lordship isn’t back yet. Come in.”

Qiao Tianya bent over at the waist to enter.

The brazier had already gone out, and it was a little cold inside the tent. Yao Wenyu was cloaked in his overcoat as he sat on the bed with a brush still in his hand. After Qiao Tianya entered, he pushed aside the small table.

Qiao Tianya took off his boots by the bed against that bit of morning light. He sagged down in silence, trapped in the cramped and narrow empty space between the bed and the small table, and rested his head on Yao Wenyu’s lap. The medicinal scent on Yao Wenyu enveloped Qiao Tianya, and he closed his eyes, as if he was sleeping in a time long bygone.

Yao Wenyu covered the hilt of the sword with one hand and covered Qiao Tianya with the other. His wide sleeves spread out all over the bed. In that minuscule bit of morning light, he lowered his head and looked at Qiao Tianya.

The incense on the table masked the smell of blood that both belonged to Yao Wenyu and Qiao Tianya.

“I have a courtyard on Mount Bodhi,” Yao Wenyu gently stroked Qiao Tianya’s hair, “where you can watch the rays of the morning sun at daybreak, and the river of stars formed by the lights of households in Qudu after sunset.”

Qiao Tianya seemed to see it.

Yao Wenyu turned his head slightly to look at the thin sheet of window paper. “The snow is here.”

The snowflakes outside the window danced gracefully in the air.

Amu’er had a gemstone secured before his forehead, and a simple and unsophisticated scimitar affixed at his waist. He bent his tall and powerfully built body over and helped Duo’erlan to pick up the Chiti silk flower. He spread his palm open. The silk flower looked just like the real thing. This was something Hasen once brought back from the borders of Qidong.

“My good lass,” Amu’er said, “follow your father back to the oasis.”

Duo’erlan took the silk flower with both hands and shook her head. “I’m Hasen’s wife. I want to defend my Heroic Eagle’s father for him.”

“His father is not old yet.” Amu’er straightened up and smiled widely in the evening glow of the setting sun. “Fighting battles is a man’s business. You allowed me to possess Suhebashou’s bear warriors.<sup>130</sup> You have already done a lot for the Hanshe Tribe. My good lass, silly girl, you’re not only Hasen’s wife, but also the mother of his child. The precious pearl of the grasslands should be riding her horse on the shores of Lake Chiti. The yellow sand of the desert here doesn’t suit you. Go back.”

Duo’erlan’s shoulders shook as she forced herself to hold back her tears, but her face still ended up wet. Holding the silk flower, she sobbed and asked, “I heard the bungle call of the King of Wolves. I smelled his butcher’s blade...”

Amu’er lowered his large palm and placed it on the center of Duo’erlan’s head, covering it. “When I was born together with Xiao Fangxu in the bosom of the Hongyan Mountains, the Hanshe Tribe was destined to fight it out with Libei until there is a victor between us. In the decades of war, we have each lost our brothers and sent out our own sons.”

His weathered face, of having been through the vicissitudes of life, was overlaid with golden light. The sunset glow was so dazzling it was as if it could contend with the morning sun.

The news from Qudu did not come back, which meant that Amu'er no longer had the advantage within Dazhou. He missed too many opportunities. Without Hasen, and without the Zhongbo supply line, the Hanshe Tribe's future was all too obvious.

"My Heroic Eagle flew over the snow-capped peaks of Libei. His father will not back down before the blade of the new King of Wolves either. We are a strong tribe among the Twelve Tribes, and this strong tribe has the Hero. We only have heroes who die in battles, not cowards who beat a retreat."

Bayin and the old wise one stood outside the golden tent. The old wise one's palms were all creased with wrinkles as he rubbed open the withered and yellow stalks of grasses and gazed at the setting out in the far distance.

Clutching his precious book, Bayin asked, "Teacher, will we win?"

The old wise one did not answer. When Hasen left, he had also kneeled in the waters of the Chashi River and asked him the same question—"Will I win?".<sup>131</sup> He let the wind blow the grass in his palm away into the distance. The old wise one's snow-white beard and hair fluttered slightly in the wind. He looked at that orb of setting sun in silence until the dome of heaven darkened.

"The wolf is here."

So said the old wise man.

The strong wind swept across the rolling mounds, and yellow sand brushed against armors. With one hand supporting his blade, the young King of Wolves slowly rose to his feet, firmly commanding everyone's line of sight. The setting sun vanished behind his back, replaced by innumerable Armored Cavalry soldiers. Meng stood on Xiao Chiye's shoulder, its sharp, penetrating gaze piercing through the gale, where it fixated on the spot ahead together with its master.

Lang Tao Xue Jin galloped forth from behind and did not stop. Xiao Chiye flipped onto the horse, and Meng flapped its wings to follow by Xiao Chiye's side. Xiao Chiye led the armored hooves of his army, stomping on the yellow sands as they charged down in an assault like the boundless dark clouds shrouding the night.

Bayin saw Duo'erlan off. He stood by the horse carriage and gave his treasured book to Duo'erlan.

“I can’t read Dazhou characters,” Duo’erlan said. “Keep it for yourself.”

Bayin was bent on placing the book beside Duo’erlan knees. “A gift for the little eagle.”

Duo’erlan covered her stomach. The flocks of sheep behind the horse carriage kept bleating incessantly. Holding on to the horse carriage, she looked at the clusters of tents and said, “... The moon tonight is too bright.”

Bayin thought Duo’erlan was worried that the return journey would be a hard one to make, so he flashed a smile and reassured her, “The Hero has already informed the tribes along the way. With the warriors from the Youxiong Tribe with you, no one will dare to hurt you.”

There was no hint of a smile on Duo’erlan’s face. She was just like a flower in the midst of wilting. Bayin could not figure out what she was thinking. Even if he had become a wise man, he was still a silly lad.

Bayin felt around his wizened pouch and found an old brush. He set this brush by Duo’erlan’s knees too. Maintaining the smile on his tanned face, he said, “Next year, when you’ve safely given birth to the little eagle, the Hero will bring you back. When that time comes, you will be the most honorable woman in the desert.”

Some of the Six Tribes had turned traitor to throw in with Xiao Chiye. The Hanshe Tribe’s status as the ruler of the desert was already an empty title that existed in name only. Bayin’s clumsy attempt at comfort could not hide a single thing.

But this time, Duo’erlan made an effort to curve her eyes into crescents. As if she believed Bayin’s words, she said, “If it’s a boy, I’ll hand him over to you to teach and guide. As for this book, I’ll return it to you when that day comes.”

Bayin scratched the back of his head rather awkwardly and said, “If it’s a boy, he will surely be as outstanding as the Heroic Eagle. He’d be the best lad of all in the desert. It’d be better to ask my teacher and the Hero to teach and guide him.” He smiled again. “Go, Duo’erlan. Your father is still waiting for you.

The folks of the Hulu Tribe herded the flock of sheep. These were their last remaining sheep, and they wanted to send them back to the oasis before the weather got worse. There were not that many warriors from the Youxiong Tribe, but their “bear horses” stood out among the ponies, and because they were carrying their sabers with them, they appeared all the more valiant and fearsome.

The Hulu Tribe was familiar with the sandy desert routes. The man in the lead drove the horse forward, and the copper bell hung high on the banner tinkled. Amid the rocking of the horse carriage, Duo'erlan waved to Bayin.

Bayin chased a few steps after her and mustered up the courage to shout, "Duo'erlan!"

Duo'erlan pushed aside the hanging screen of the carriage and looked at him.

Bayin stopped in his tracks and stood in place, waving his hand again without saying a word.

The pitch-dark sky enveloped the desert. A saker falcon in the wind hovered over the Hongying flag, which flapped noisily in the wind as the tinkling of the copper bell receded further and further into the distance. Bayin clenched his empty hands tightly into fists and chanted in silence for victory without retracting his gaze.

The moonlight was flimsy as it paved the path underfoot, looking as if it took just one step for it to break. Horses' hooves sank into it and abruptly departed.

The old wise one tossed the withered branch he used for divination in his lap. Putting his palms together, he lowered his head and silently evoked the Heavenly God of Chiti.

Bayin finally turned around and ran towards the old wise man, shouting, "Teach..."

Before the saker falcon above the Hongying banner could react, a gyrfalcon swiftly swooped down and suddenly tore it apart. Grabbing the saker falcon's remnants, Meng flapped its wings in midair and ripped off the saker falcon's feathers.

It all happened so quickly that Bayin was not able to snap out of his shock. The din of feasting and drinking among the tents had yet to stop.

"Wolves!" The Hanshe Tribe cavalry soldier on night patrol sped across the sands and did all he could to shout himself hoarse in the Biansha tongue. "Surprise attack—!"

A long blade came sliding out with a swish as heavy armor knocked over the cavalryman directly from behind. The pony was totally powerless in the face of the tidal wave of steel and iron, and in the blink of an eye, it was completely engulfed.

Bayin stood stupefied in place.

The Libei Armored Cavalry should have only just passed Mosanchuan. The news was that Xiao Chiye intended to block the exit of Mosanchuan, and his main forces had yet to arrive here, but the shocking turn of events unfolding before him made it clear that Xiao Chiye had not only come, but he had also chosen the most direct way of doing it.

“Xiao, Xiao Chiye...” Bayin whipped his head back and hollered, “The Armored Cavalry has launched a surprise attack!”

Armored hooves trampled over the wooden-made fence at the very edge. Too late to get onto their horses, the Biansha warriors who emerged from the tents met the Armored Cavalry head-on with their scimitars in hand.

Xiao Chiye’s Langli Blade was a heavy beast. Coupled with his extraordinary arm strength, he was practically unrivaled when he cleaved and hacked. Lang Tao Xue Jin was the first to charge among the Hanshe Tribe’s tents. Several splatters of fresh blood sprayed in between each lift of his blade.

Heads tumbled to a stop at Bayin’s feet. Bayin’s throat choked up, seized as he already was with terror. Amid the glares of blade and glints of swords, he saw the eyes of a ravenous wolf.

An eye for an eye.

Bayin hastily stepped back and almost fell.

Gasping lightly for breath, Xiao Chiye raised the arm that was holding the blade and rubbed the blood off his cheek with the back of his hand. The smile gradually materializing on his face spoke of extreme danger. After months of enduring the rigors of a long, arduous journey, he finally arrived at his destination.

“Amu’er—” Amidst the sprays of blood and dancing flames, Xiao Chiye tilted his head back and demanded in a voice as cold as ice, “where is he?”

The flap of the golden tent lifted open, and a cold glint glided along the edge of the old scimitar in the moonlight. Amu’er bent at the waist to make his way out of the golden tent. His equally strapping tall figure obscured the sand and dust beneath his feet, as if he was also the stabilizing force of the Hanshe Tribe.

Saker falcons surrounded Meng, who was hovering alone on its own.

Xiao Chiye shook off the blood on his blade and heard the beats of the war drums.

CHAPTER 282: LOFTY PALACE

Meng barged among the cast of falcons as they attacked him. It hissed at the top of its voice. Waves of fire followed in the wake of the collapsed tents and leaped onto the banner. The Hongying banner instantaneously burst into flames.

Langli Blade came cleaving down and struck against the scimitar, letting loose an ear-piercing screech of friction as blade scraped against blade. Sparks spattered as the blades slipped past.

Amu'er's arm sank slightly. "Your arm strength is even stronger than your father's."

Capitalizing on his height, Xiao Chiye dragged Langli Blade with astounding momentum and sent Amu'er's scimitar swinging and smashing down. Amu'er took the blows, and although it was only a few times, the impact brought on a tearing pain in the area between his thumb and index finger. Under Xiao Chiye's forceful attacks, he took half a step back.

Xiao Chiye's young age was his biggest advantage.

Amu'er was already old. When Xiao Fangxu stepped down after becoming ill, Amu'er retreated to the desert. He returned anew to the battlefield after many years had elapsed, and even though he did not appear old, he could no longer physically compare to Xiao Chiye, who was in his prime.

"Have you come here," Amu'er hoisted up his scimitar, "to give me back my son?"

The attacking Armored Cavalry suddenly dispersed all over. Unexpectedly enough, there was a mounted crossbow in the ripped apart golden tent. The veins of the warriors of the Hanshe Tribe, who had been waiting for a long time, bulged as they shifted its direction under the clicking sound of the crossbow trigger turning. Heavy arrow instantly hurtled forth towards the Armored Cavalry.

There was no movement in the tent that had collapsed in response. Reacting quickly as he rolled over the ground, Gu Jin reported, "The tent is empty!"

The stables of the Hanshe Tribe had long been raided by Xiao Chiye, but warriors lying in ambush suddenly emerged from among the night sand. A short while later, whistles rose all around.

The sound of horse hooves.

Gu Jin prostrated on the ground with his ear to it and immediately reported, “They still have horses!”

The terrain where the Hanshe Tribe was stationed was wide and open. There were no defensive structures installed at its borders. It could not even compare to the Mengtuo Tribe at the entrance of Mosanchuan. But even when Hasen died in battle and the enemies’ forces were pressing on to the border, they still did not get attacked by the remaining eleven tribes—because none of the tribes dared to come.

During the reign of Xiande, Amu’er swept up Zhongbo’s armory. Hasen’s gears and supplies were funded by his father. As the man most skilled in reforms and revolution in the desert, Amu’er’s guts and spunk were, most of the time, extraordinary.

The Hanshe Tribe dwelled deep in seclusion in the desert. They had venomous fangs like snakes.<sup>124</sup>

The Libei Armored Cavalry had already scattered apart. Chen Yang was about to give his command when he reined in his horse, but unexpectedly, a pony suddenly came barging from the side. The battering ram-like force did not provide Chen Yang the chance to exert his strength at all and directly knocked him off his horse.

With a ferocious expression in his eyes, the bare-chest Lizard spat in the Biansha tongue, “An eye for an eye.”

Chen Yang rolled a few times after landing on the ground, and the Lizard’s iron hammer smashed down beside his helmet. Even if it did not hit the target, the reverberations it brought on when it brushed past still made Chen Yang dizzy.

The Lizards launched a pincer attack from the sides behind Xiao Chiye. His blade that he held aloft abruptly changed trajectory, passing under his elbow and armpit to pierce through a Lizard’s chest. A spray of blood erupted forth and splashed onto Xiao Chiye’s shoulders and arms before flowing down along his armor to the saddle.

A scimitar at the side came swinging down, and Xiao Chiye deflected his head aside to dodge the blow. His little braid brushed against the other man’s blade. Unable to draw out Langli Blade immediately, he opted to bend his left arm and elbow the man hard in the face. The Lizard did not expect Xiao Chiye’s strength to be this terrifying. His entire face felt like it was about to crack open, his nasal bone broken instantly.

The blade before Xiao Chiye was already pressing in toward him. Langli Blade clung against his armor as he pulled it out in time to parry the scimitar with a resounding thud.

Lang Tao Xue Jin abruptly galloped forward, and Langli Blade, which was shouldering the other man's force, caused the other man's body to flip over during its advance. Xiao Chiye did not have the chance to catch his breath, because the moment Lang Tao Xue Jin galloped forth, the mounted crossbow in the golden tent followed suit and turned around too. At the same time he brought down the other man, a heavy arrow sliced through the wind and came charging at him!

The mounted crossbow was a siege weapon, and its weight and lethality were enough for one of it to go up against ten men. It had won countless victories for Da Zhou in its offensive and defensive battles in the early years. When Shen Zechuan was defending Duanzhou, he also chose to use it as a defensive weapon, which served to show just how formidable it was—the crucial thing was that it required several people to work together just to draw the bow, and the force of a hurtling, heavy iron-headed arrow was definitely not something a man alone could resist. Even Xiao Chiye himself could not shoulder the force of it alone when he encountered it on a thousand li long boundary line, let alone at such a short distance.

Gu Jin practically braced himself against the ground and broke into a dash at the same time, using the fastest speed he had ever mustered in his life, shouting himself hoarse as he ran, "Second Master!"

Xiao Fangxu was gone. The battlefield was the most unreasonable place in the world. To Libei, even if half of them were wounded or dead tonight, they could not leave Xiao Chiye behind!

Chen Yang was close to him, and when he straightened up, he encountered the iron hammer again. This time, he leveled his blade to block the blow. With an unexpected burst of strength, he shouldered the weight of the Lizard's iron hammer and lifted it up. Chen Yang's four limbs were all trembling. A deep bellow burst forth from his throat as he hissed through clenched teeth, "Block—the arrow!"

The gale, following in the wake of the heavy arrow, was already a short distance away from Xiao Chiye. He released the reins, and Lang Tao Xue Xin beneath him neighed as it dropped onto its front knees. Xiao Chiye immediately rolled off his horse. The heavy arrow hurtled past with terrifying strength and slammed into the crowd.

The warriors of the Hanshe Tribe dashing madly in the sand flipped onto their horses. Holding up their scimitars, they came converging from all directions.

Xiao Chiye gasped heavily for breath. The hair by his temples was already drenched in sweat.

“Baya’er of the Mengtuo Tribe is the most untrustworthy bastard in the desert who doesn’t keep his word.” Amu’er scraped the blood droplets off his scimitar and rubbed his thumb against his stubble. “And to think you’d believe them. This is a mistake Xiao Fangxu would never make.”

Xiao Chiye teetered as he rose to his feet. The arm guard on his right arm was dented from the sudden assault of the heavy arrow earlier, but it did not crack. Xiao Chiye stabbed Langli Blade into the ground at his feet and raised his hand to untie the arm guard and secure it at the side of his waist.

Under the moonlight smudged by the flames, Amu’er saw Xiao Chiye’s shadow extending all the way before him. Behind him, the endless, silent desert stretched.

“Stop calling my father’s name.” His words ignited Xiao Chiye’s deeply-seated fury and resentment. Hatred erupted in his chest; even the wounds on his back were burning.

Xiao Fangxu would never make such a mistake.

Xiao Fangxu would not make many mistakes.

But Hasen left Xiao Fangxu in the blizzard. Every time Xiao Chiye heard Amu’er say a word, it would evoke his memory of Xiao Fangxu’s body in the accumulated snow.

“Xiao Fangxu, Xiao Fangxu—” Xiao Chiye’s eyes were red as he said in a hoarse voice. “You people took my father’s head away and trampled the dignity of the King of Wolves under your feet.”

Xiao Chiye pulled out Langli Blade.

“Give him back to me.” His expression was slightly malevolent as he violently cleaved and hacked while advancing with staggered steps. He shouted himself hoarse at Amu’er.

“GIVE HIM BACK TO ME!”

Meng suddenly plunged as if it couldn’t hold up against the assault from all sides. Xiao Chiye’s bellow reverberated through the night sky. When Meng neared the ground, it suddenly flapped its wings and circled upward. The saker falcons pursuing it relentlessly from behind were still continuing with their downward descent. Gu Jin sidestepped them and bent his finger to whistle at the sky. The next moment, countless falcons' wings flapped in unison, and, at the same time they soared into the sky, they pounced on the saker falcons.

Aerial combat was the Libei falcons' domain to begin with!

Meng drew in its wings and barged its way among the cast of saker falcons. One for bearing grudges, it found that particular saker falcon that had pursued it the most relentlessly and tore it to pieces in between circling before it would let the matter rest.

The Libei Armored Cavalry and Biansha Cavalry converged in the space between the tents. Bayin ran and fell to his knees before the golden tent, where he said to the old wise one, "Teacher, I'll help you leave!"

The old wise one still had his head lowered and palms placed together. His aged body was just like a withered tree. His white hair dangled silently on both sides.

Bayin's heart went cold. He reached out and placed a hand under the old wise one's nose, and the color instantly drained from his face. He could not hold back his sobs and promptly cried out loud, "Teacher!"

The gushing of blood accompanied the fighting and killing under the curtain of the night. Half of the Hanshe Tribe's tents had collapsed. The ambush Amu'er left in the outer perimeter failed to net him any advantage from the Libei Armored Cavalry. Meanwhile, the Lizards' iron hammers found it hard to unleash their full potential in the face of the brand new long blades.

The speed at which Xiao Chiye had grown up was all too fast. This was a fact that even Amu'er himself had to concede. The Mengtuo Tribe that alone guarded Mosanchuan were indeed untrustworthy bastards who did not keep their word. They did not tell Xiao Chiye that Amu'er still had horses and supplies, and they did not come forth to provide reinforcements as promised. But similarly, Baya'er had even less of an intention of coming to fight the battle for Amu'er. He was just like the fisherman with blade in hand waiting for the last moment to reap the profits at the expense of the other two. He was not only afraid Amu'er still had a card up his sleeve; he also wanted to throw in with the absolute victor of this duel.

Stars dotted the horizon. A horse suddenly galloped out from the end of the desert. The hem of Duo'erlan's skirt fluttered amidst the backdrop of the massive setting moon as she led that batch of Youxiong Tribe warriors over on horseback.

Bayin was a sorry figure as he wiped his tears. “Duo’erlan, you silly girl!”

Duo’erlan’s black hair danced in the wind as she reined in her horse. Her pretty green eyes reflected the flames as she said, “I married Hasen. I belong to Hasen’s tribe, and Hasen, too, belongs to my tribe. Father! You’re right. The strong tribe has the Hero, and Hasen is my Hero!”

She drew out her own dagger.

“We only have heroes who die in battles, not cowards who beat a retreat! Baya’er, listen,” Duo’erlan faced the desert and said at the top of her voice, “Duo’erlan won’t blame you for submitting to the strong! But the desert has its own strong fighters in the desert. The Mengtuo Tribe once possessed the glory of the Hero decades ago. When you kneel before Xiao Chiye’s Armored Cavalry, it’s the Mengtuo Tribe’s dignity you killed off!”

The harsh rebuke of a woman blended into the sound of fighting and killing under the moon, and it made Baya’er, who was biding his time, feel terribly inferior and ashamed.

“I heard your daughter, Wuya, dared to make an assassination attempt on Xiao Chiye with a dagger.” Duo’erlan’s countenance was solemn and respectful. “I admire her, and so does Hasen! When my son is born in the future, I will have him acknowledge Wuya as his aunt. This is the backbone of the desert people!” As she spoke, she crassly spat a mouthful of saliva to the side. “But I will also have my son keep firmly in mind that the Mengtuo Tribe is spineless. The chieftain, Baya’er, is a coward!”

Duo’erlan’s chest heaved. She cracked her horsewhip and led the warriors of the Youxiong Tribe into a charge forward. The Libei Armored Cavalry’s numbers were terrifying, but there was no fear in Duo’erlan’s eyes. She was the most dazzling precious pearl of the desert. Even if she did not have the strong and sturdy body of a warrior, she was willing to charge toward an invincible wall of iron.

Hasen did not kneel to Xiao Chiye in his last moments. Duo’erlan understood him. Even if they were to die in battle, they had to die standing.

“Silly girl,” Amu’er roared with laughter before continuing to say with a reverent countenance, “You’re wrong. The Hero of the Hulu Tribe is not Hasen. It’s Duo’erlan!”

The Hanshe Tribe's initial low morale soared. Baya'er was still hesitating, but beside him, Wuya ran a few steps forth and said to the warriors of the Mengtuo Tribe as she pointed ahead, "We will guard the main gate of Mosanchuan and leave Xiao Chiye and the Libei Armored Cavalry to fall on their own! If all of you are going to kneel to him, you'll never be able to stand up for the next twenty years!"

Xiao Chiye kicked over the torch as he traded blows with Amu'er. His armor was tarnished with fresh blood and desert sand. The Youxiong Tribe warriors who had charged their way in amidst the sea of fire drew their blades and fought valiantly, because Xiao Chiye had killed their leader, Dalantai, at the Bianjun Commandery. At the very moment when the Mengtuo Tribe also drew out their blades, Xiao Chiye found himself caught deep in a real siege.

Shen Zechuan, who was taking a nap on his desk, woke up with a start. He moved his arm which had gone numb. The lights in the hall had been extinguished. There was still the sound of the advisors discussing from the side hall, but it appeared abnormally quiet here.

Shen Zechuan held on to the door frame. The wind outside was so icy that his back felt doubly cold. Hearing movements, Fei Sheng looked back and could not help but turn pale with fright. "Master, you are going to catch a cold!"

"The desert." The jade on Shen Zechuan's right ear swayed gently. He covered his mouth and stifled a cough to ask, "No letter yet?"

Gu Jin got on his horse, and Chen Yang led the army to assemble. With Xiao Chiye as the center, they constantly closed in. The armors of the Libei Armored Cavalry were severely worn out. Only Xiao Chiye was not wearing a helmet.

"In order to mount a surprise attack, you didn't bring along your main forces." Amu'er kept away his scimitar that had been chipped courtesy of Xiao Chiye at the side of his waist. "The young are always impulsive."

The clicking sound of crossbow triggers all around them was intensive. For tonight, Amu'er had also staked all he had onto this single throw.

Thick clouds obscured the moon. The sandy lands were packed with warriors of the desert. The warriors of the Youxiong Tribe that Duo'erlan had called upon were all the remaining forces of the Youxiong Tribe.

Thanks to Duo'erlan, they got to recuperate for a period of time in the Hanshe Tribe, and now, they had recovered from the serious injuries they sustained when they were crushed and routed by Xiao Chiye a few months back.

“You are a genius,” Amu'er said in admiration. “A genius of Libei.”

The bowstrings of the mounted crossbows were stretched taut. Heavy arrows all aimed at Xiao Chiye.

The gemstone in the center of Amu'er's forehead was already loosened. He took it off, appearing slightly lonely. He looked out into the distance in the direction of the Hongyan Mountains. “But, you killed my son.”

To the people of Da Zhou, the Chashi River was a jade belt<sup>125</sup> in the landscape. However, to the people of the desert, it was the origin of the rivers – the mother river – far off in the distance. At one time, they shared the Hongyan Mountains with Da Zhou, but the Libei Armored Cavalry's rise to prominence caused them to keep retreating to the desert, where they could only kill each other for rations.

All his life, Amu'er wanted to lead the Twelve Tribes to the west of the Chashi River.

Plunder. Pillage.

The people of Libei pillowed upon the mountains and rivers, while the desert people slept among the yellow sand. They made each other acquaintances with blades and swords, and three successive generations of heroes and heroines all met on the banks of the Chashi River. Spring came, and autumn went. No one was spared.

“The war has to end, eventually.” Amu'er hung the forehead ribbon which the gemstone was secured onto the hilt of his blade. “I will return your head to your elder brother.”

Meng whirled in the air and swooped down. The falcon of Libei was very quiet. Xiao Chiye raised his left arm to let Meng perch. “I'm afraid you no longer have this chance.”

Grit flew up from the sandy lands. Under the rustling sounds, the Mengtuo Tribe squad that was running forward saw blades that had long hilts and short blades.

It was too late for Baya'er to regret. Stamping his foot, he cried out, “Lu Guangbai. There's still Lu Guangbai!”

Lu Guangbai, who had once penetrated deep into the desert, was similarly familiar with the desert routes as the Hulu Tribe was. Xiao Chiye left his main troops behind not because of the surprise attack, but to lure the snake out of its hole.

Amu'er was unwilling to arbitrarily meet the enemies head-on. Only Xiao Chiye's rash and reckless surprise attack could draw him out into the open. If Duo'erlan left with the Youxiong Tribe, then after tonight, Xiao Chiye would still need to penetrate deeper into the desert. But Duo'erlan returned. She helped Xiao Chiye accomplish his ploy to round up all of them in one fell swoop.

"Amu'er," Xiao Chiye tightened his grip on the hilt of his blade anew. "The war has to end, eventually."

Yellow sand billowed. When Lu Guangbai dashed his way before the Youxiong Tribe warriors, he abruptly withdrew, and the Libei Armored Cavalry behind him charged up. As he brushed past the Libei Armored Cavalry, he filled in the gaps among the Lizards and brandished his long blade to brazenly parry the Lizards' iron hammers.

Powerful forces collided. Lu Guangbai's military boots promptly slipped backward in the sand. He braced himself with an arm and grasped a handful of yellow sand. With a smile, he said, "Great strength there."

The Lizard spread opened his arms, looking as if he was going to obstruct the Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops.

Lu Guangbai's long blade suddenly passed over his head and struck the Lizard's iron hammer with a "thud" in between turns. The Lizard had only traded blows with the Libei Armored Cavalry and had still yet to encounter this kind of strange weapon, where it was the hilt that was long. When he swung his hammer, he could not reach Lu Guangbai's body, and when he parried, he could not keep up with Lu Guangbai's speed. All he could do was keep retreating in this flurry of intense attacks.

The Libei Armored Cavalry, having already broken through the outer line of defenses, joined Xiao Chiye from the side. Xiao Chiye did not mount his horse again. Instead, he charged in to fight on foot with the Biansha warriors. This time, the Armored Cavalry was like a black tide that came bulldozing over with absolutely crushing numbers.

Amu'er killed several people and encountered Xiao Chiye again in the tumble of armors. The strong wind Xiao Chiye brought up sliced through the air from top to bottom and cleaved apart the front of Amu'er clothes. Langli Blade wedged itself in the crack of the scimitar, and Xiao Chiye suddenly pressed in two steps closer with such force that Amu'er retreated.

Amu'er exerted his strength to lift his blade up and overturn the constraint Langli Blade had imposed on it, but Langli Blade counterattacked swiftly. The long journey did not even deplete Xiao Chiye's energy. In this moment, he was unusually focused, so focused that he did not care about the injuries on his body. Those eyes of his were so calm it was terrifying.

The scimitar bounced off from the impact of the collision, but it did not slip out of his hands. Amu'er regained his grip on it and turned around to kick Xiao Chiye in the abdomen, but Xiao Chiye did not retreat as he had hoped. Holding up against the force, he slammed the hilt of his blade hard into the side of Amu'er's cheek.

Amu'er did not fall over to the ground. The metallic taste of blood saturated his mouth, and his teeth were sore from the impact of Xiao Chiye's blow.

Xiao Chiye's fighting style was a blend of martial arts from various schools, but not once had he ever broken away from his original school. He was just as overbearing and domineering as Xiao Fangxu was. When he really got serious in battle, nine out of ten times, someone would die.

Oh, behold the young King of Wolves.

The vision in Amu'er's left eye was already a little blurry. He saw the moon burning. The sorrowful cries of the Hanshe Tribe pierced through the vast, boundless night. All those stars that once belonged to him fell. The hero who had come to the end of the road had to admit that he was already advanced in age.

Hasen.

Amu'er's proud heroic eagle.

Amu'er seemed to see the back of his son when he left. It was also on a moonlit night like this. Hasen waved his arm, and his bashful red hair was then covered up by the color of the night.

Every time Xiao Chiye swung his blade, Amu'er's scimitar would emit a cry of pain. Xiao Chiye's mettle was on full display, undisguised. Every blow of his struck the sharpest part of the scimitar.

This battle was no longer evenly matched, but the Libei Armored Cavalry's one-sided crushing of their foes.

Duo'erlan's horse was abruptly knocked to the ground. She fell and looked as the dagger slipped from her hand and disappeared among the armored hooves. Her cheeks were splattered with blood, and as she wiped them, she involuntarily burst into sobs.

With his own dagger in tow, Bayin charged into the chaos and shouted to Duo'erlan, "Take my horse, Duo'erlan. Run!"

Covering her stomach, Duo'erlan shook her head. "You should leave!"

Bayin gasped unevenly for breath. He suddenly grasped Duo'erlan's arms and said sincerely, "The little eagle must live." He could not stop himself from crying. Sobs escaped his throat. "Silly girl of Lake Chiti, run —"

Blood suddenly materialized. Before Bayin could finish his words, he fell face-first into a pool of blood. Duo'erlan widened her eyes blankly. "No..."

Chen Yang raised his helmet and looked at Duo'erlan with cold detachment as he said in the Biansha tongue, "Achi killed our left flank in Duanzhou, and this man was the one who came up with the plan. I'm just repaying the debt."

Bayin was still grasping Duo'erlan's arms. Duo'erlan bent over to hold up the young man's body. In a trembling voice that had already changed in pitch, she weakly shouted in a thin voice, "Stop..."

Achi not only killed the left flank of the Libei Armored Cavalry near Duanzhou, he also took away the heads of all the armored cavalymen in the left flank squad. They camped on the banks of the Chashi River, kicking these heads and urinating into the Armored Cavalymen's helmets. Chen Yang could never forget this humiliation.

The fire was blazing, but the moon was cold.

Shouts.

Neighing of horses.

Cries of falcons.

More and more people fell. Armored hooves trampled across tents. After the raging fire came the endless ashes. The Hanshe Tribe that had been fearsome in the desert for thirty years turned into mud in this one night, bearing the full weight of Libei's fury that had been boiling for a very long time.

The fires before the golden tent collapsed together. The forehead chain of Amu'er's gemstone broke as Langli Blade advanced. Meanwhile, the Hongying banner that was a symbol of an all-powerful strong tribe finally toppled over in the burning. Xiao Chiye's figure blocked out the sight of it all.

In taking them by storm, Xiao Chiye forced Amu'er to lose all his routes of retreat. He shouted loudly in the raging inferno, "Amu'er!"

Amu'er took the blow from his blade with some difficulty. Dripping sweat dampened his eyes as Xiao Chiye closed in on him.

The more Xiao Chiye fought, the more valiant he was. His unbridled, untamed nature came from the grasslands. Only the mother earth of the Hongyan Mountains could beget such a man. Sweat mixed in with his soaring battle spirit. His eyes were just as dazzlingly bright as the glints and flashes of his blade, a blade which contained a blazing sun within.

Amu'er was tired out from the fierce battle. His scimitar was already slow to react, and it finally slipped from his hand when Xiao Chiye launched yet another violent attack.

The moon thinned out, and the color of the night dimmed. Day was about to break.

Amu'er's gemstone tumbled to his feet, where the yellow sand beneath was soaked with blood. He tilted his head up. There were very few left of the saker falcons in the firmament.

"The heavenly gods have been kind to the heroic eagle." Amu'er suddenly raised his right arm high and let out a last roar towards the remnants of the desert. "I, Amu'er, have ruled the Six Tribes for twenty years and reached the inner parts of Da Zhou. I have not let the Hongying banner down. The Chashi River we yearned for even in our dreams—"

Langli Blade came cleaving down right at Amu'er's head, and Amu'er used his arm that had an arm guard to block the blow.

"—The Chashi River we yearned for even in our dreams," In the interval, Amu'er laughed heartily without inhibition at Xiao Chiye and said resolutely, "Xiao Chiye, twenty years later, the Heroic Eagle of the desert will once again still fly over Hongyan Mountains. You kill me, kill us, but you can't kill all the eagles of the desert! Twenty years, forty years," The arm guard made a cracking sound under the blade. Amu'er continued in a quiet, solemn voice, "the desert shall one day welcome its true ruler!"

At the same time Xiao Chiye exerted pressure on his blade, he bellowed, "Twenty years, forty years, the wolves of Libei will always be stationed on the line of defenses. Bring it on!" With eyes reddened, he said somberly, "This time, next time, I'll be waiting for you people on the banks of the Chashi River. The Twelve Tribes will never stride across the Chashi River!”

Amu’er’s arm guard broke off completely. Following right after, the blade cut through it like a hot knife through butter and ended his shouts face on.

Duo’erlan’s sobs came to an abrupt halt, and then she let loose a heartbreaking wail. She clambered to her feet, but stepped on the hem of her skirt and fell to the ground. She clambered up again, clutching the dagger as she rushed towards Xiao Chiye.

The swift wind swept through the flying sand, and the blade suddenly pointed right in the center of Duo’erlan’s brows.

Duo’erlan’s hair scattered all over her body. She stopped before the blade, the tears in her eyes streaming incessantly while she trembled all over. Finally, she gritted her teeth and spat in abhorrence, “Kill me! Xiao Chiye, kill me!”

The beads of blood on Langli Blade dripped in the center of Duo’erlan’s brows and weaved into her tears, obscuring this face of hers.

The first rays of the morning sun at the end of the sky pierced through the darkness, and the thin light of dawn spread over the barren sands. Xiao Chiye’s armor radiated with subtle light. He lifted his chin slightly, and sweat trickled down. To Duo’erlan, he said, “The Libei Armored Cavalry do not kill women.”

Duo’erlan’s teeth chattered—that was hatred. Here she stood, but even her dignity of dying in battle was deprived by Xiao Chiye!

“Get on your horse and get out of this expanse of desert land. In the future, the west of Mosanchuan belongs to Libei. If the Twelve Tribes dare to overstep the boundary line by even one step without my command,” Xiao Chiye’s blade shifted down and jabbed heavily into the ground before Duo’erlan’s feet, as if to draw an insurmountable chasm here, “the severe frost will slaughter the Twelves Tribes clean.”

The wolf banner of Libei fluttered in the blue dome of heaven. Xiao Chiye’s side profile was frosty and solemn. This was the last remaining mercy the King of Wolf had. His battle blade slew the heroes of Biansha, while his Armored Cavalry passed through silently like the severe frost. Behind him stood the never-changing Hongyan Mountains.

Amu’er once massacred the six prefectures. That was not being powerful. Massacre was a kind of cowardice and weakness. The truly strong ones dared to face up to the encroachment of the years. From now on, Libei was no longer alone. Xiao Chiye had the strongest backing in the world. He was the most unstoppable blade in the world.

Duo'erlan slid to her knees on the ground and bawled out loud.

Xiao Chiye kept his blade away into its sheath. No longer looking at Duo'erlan, he turned around and got on his horse, facing the countless Libei Armored Cavalrymen.

"We won..." someone said softly.

Xiao Chiye's back was to the sunrise. At the very moment when the sun shone in all its glorious radiance, he looked just like the day he scored a victory in his first battle at fourteen years of age—although covered in dirt and dust all over, the expression in his eyes was unyielding and untameable.

He cracked his horsewhip and laughed out loud heartily amidst the caresses of the intense wind. "A resounding victory!"

The Libei King of Wolves!

Emotions swelled in Lu Guangbai's heart as he watched Xiao Chiye ride his horse. That kind of indescribable pride was very much like the moment when the Four Generals of Xiande stepped across the border.

A war general was loyal to the land. The Four Generals of Yongyi<sup>126</sup> had retired, and the Four Generals of Xiande<sup>127</sup> were worn out. The era of traitors and treacherous subjects was about to end, and the new brave generals would inevitably follow close on Xiao Chiye's heel and emerge from among the mountains and rivers.

"Aye," Lu Guangbai hugged the hilt of his blade in his arms and chased a few steps after Xiao Chiye, shouting, "We don't have horses!"

The Libei Armored Cavalry galloped in the great desert, the bursts of the men's hearty laughter reverberating through the skies. The dark clouds when they came turned into spring thunder<sup>128</sup> on their homeward journey.

Meng whirled and soared, breaking through that layer of white clouds. Home was just right ahead.

The news of victory arrived in Qudu only two months later. It was a snowy day, and Shen Zechuan, who was in the warmed hall, jolted to his feet. The advisors on both sides stood up as well.

"Whoa, we won!" Yu Xiaozai slapped his thigh in his joy. "I knew it. Second Master is invincible in battle. No problem at all!"

Gao Zhongxiong's face lit up with delight, and he hurriedly said, "I, I'll write up the news of victory! This battle is going to go down in history!"

Owing to the bitterly cold weather, Yao Wenyu rarely showed up these days. Shen Zechuan had urgently summoned Jiran into the capital, and Jiran was still on the way. On hearing the word "history", Yao Wenyu suppressed his cough and traded glances with Kong Ling beside him.

Kong Ling gave a slight nod of his head. "Qudu has no master now. To welcome back Second Master, we will still have to make preparations early."

The advisors were all in good spirits. Only Shen Zechuan turned to the side and asked softly, "Is Ce'an well?"

Fei Sheng had long inquired about it. He reported back softly too, "Don't worry, Master. Second Master is fine!"

Shen Zechuan felt a little reassured. There were green and luxuriant potted plants in the warmed hall that Zhou Gui's wife had sent over. Shen Zechuan gazed at them for a moment. Surprisingly enough, he had the impulse to cut a branch and hide it in his bosom.

It was already the hour of xu when the gentlemen left. The hanging screen at the door rose and fell. Yao Wenyu, however, picked up the teacup and unhurriedly stirred aside the tea froth. His sickly appearance was all the more obvious when he was deep in thought. On his return to Qudu, Yuanzhuo did not meet with his old friends, nor did he return to the former residence of the Yao clan.

Shen Zechuan looked at the documents on his desk. "You said this morning that you wanted to go and see Xue Xiuzhuo?"

It was very quiet inside and outside the warmed hall, so quiet that they could only hear the sound of snow falling. Gazing at the rising and falling tea froth in the teacup, Yao Wenyu answered, "We are both men on our deathbeds. I ought to see him."

Shen Zechuan averted his gaze away. No matter how self-possessed and composed he was, he had to feel emotionally moved by these words.

Yao Wenyu did not drink the tea. He looked to the window where the dim light of the lantern was seeping through. Shadows of the snow drifted down gently, a piece at a time.

"It's the new year." Yao Wenyu smiled. "Your Lordship, may your new year be a smooth-sailing one."

Xue Xiuzhuo was locked up in the Ministry of Justice's prison. The hair he had bundled up into a bun was tidy and in order. Even without that layer of official robe, he still maintained his usual composure.

When Yao Wenyu's wheelchair arrived, Xue Xiuzhuo set down his chopsticks he was using for his meal, not in the least bit surprised as he looked at him through the door. "It's cold in the first lunar month. Has Shen Zechuan sent people to clean up the streets?"

Yao Wenyu turned his wheelchair. There was no snow covering his shoulders. "The Imperial Army has their own arrangements," he answered.

Xue Xiuzhuo held his knees and looked squarely at Yao Wenyu. They both once lived in each other's shadows. In the first half of their lives, Xue Xiuzhuo was that nameless blade. In the latter half, Yao Wenyu was that shattered jade.

"The snow on the mountain at the beginning of spring has melted," Xue Xiuzhuo said. "Teacher's burial mound isn't well-positioned; see if you can fix it."

"You reside permanently in Qudu," Yao Wenyu said. "Didn't you go and take a look?"

Xue Xiuzhuo's straightened spine was left cooling in the flying snow behind him. He truthfully answered, "I didn't dare to go."

Silence blanketed the cell.

Yao Wenyu lowered his eyes, looking as if he was slightly smiling. He set the white chess piece he had been grasping in his palm on the table and soundlessly pushed it toward Xue Xiuzhuo in the dimness.

Xue Xiuzhuo gazed at that particular chess piece. In the long, endless silence, he seemed to have heard the sound of rain on Mount Bodhi.

"Many years ago," Xue Xiuzhuo's voice was calm. "Teacher did not look at me through the noble clan's prejudiced lens of those of lawful and common birth and promoted me into the imperial court to serve as an official. I read Qi Huilian's essays on contemporary politics and learned just how vast the world was. There was a kind of people called 'court officials'. They busied themselves running around the various lands of Da Zhou, becoming indispensable pillars of Da Zhou. During the reign of Yongyi when Qi Huilian was imprisoned, Teacher lingered many times at the watchtower that accorded him a view of Zhaozui Temple. I asked him what he was looking at, and he answered he was looking at the last 'official' in this world. I found it strange then, because Qi Huilian might be one, but so was he. Then the reign of Xiande came around, and many a number of us died to collect evidence of Hua Siqian's guilt. The officials, the functionaries... all of these people were loyal subjects from the local regions, and they basically all died out."

Xue Xiuzhuo thought of these for way too long, so long he grew numb and developed a heart of stone. He would no longer cry inconsolably in the middle of the night. He respected Hai Liangyi so much, but the reality was too cruel.

"These people have no graves, no tombs. They all died in the tussle for power between factions, their existences wiped away clean with a wave of the noble clans' sleeves." Xue Xiuzhuo's eyes were emotionless. "The remonstrance at the hunting grounds during the reign of Xiande was the hope of countless people whose names you have never heard of. We took down Hua Siqian, but Teacher did not continue to push on."

As such, the empress dowager survived, and the noble clans remained indestructible. When Li Jianheng ascended to the throne, Xue Xiuzhuo had the thought to assist him too, but Li Jianheng could not shoulder the heavy responsibility at all.

What exactly was Hai Liangyi persevering for?

Xue Xiuzhuo did not understand. He stood at the fork in the road, no longer willing to follow Hai Liangyi. He could not see the light in this path.

"Even until today," Xue Xiuzhuo raised his eyes, "I still do not approve of Teacher's path. No one can convince me in this game, and you can't either, Yuanzhuo."

Yao Wenyu turned his wheelchair around and made his way out of the cell.

Xue Xiuzhuo said as he looked at Yao Wenyu's back, "Heaven beget me, Xue Xiuzhuo, so take my life, call me what you will. Between you and me, who has won? I was merely defeated. My master was born at the wrong time and lost to Shen Zechuan. It was her timing that was wrong, not her fate."

Yao Wenyu's wheelchair braked to a stop. He did not look back but merely just turned his head aside a little in the shadows to enunciate, word for word, "Timing. Fate. Luck."

The cell door shut with a "clang", completely separating them on the sides between light and dark.

Yao Wenyu pushed his wheelchair along the narrow passage. When he neared the front door, he suddenly started choking and coughing. The light at the entrance was dim. Yao Wenyu held on to the handles of his wheelchair, gradually losing sight of what lay ahead amidst his gasps for breaths.

“Mister...”

The warden at the side cried out in alarm.

Timing, fate, luck—none of which is within my control.129

Yao Wenyu’s fingers made a weak, despairing grab at empty air ahead of him as he toppled over.

When Yao Wenyu woke, it was in a room lit with a dim lamp.

Shen Zechuan watched over him at the side and said softly, “Jiran and Songyue are about to arrive. Have a chat with me as we wait for them.”

Yao Wenyu looked at the draped curtains and also answered in a soft voice, “I had Songyue go to Mount Bodhi and plant a Bodhi tree there to wait for me.”

Shen Zechuan lowered his eyes, his eyes stinging hotly as if the tears would fall if he so much as blinked again.

“The winter really is long,” Yao Wenyu said in melancholy. “Before I entered the capital, I thought I might be able to wait until the flowers on Mount Bodhi bloomed.”

“Wait for a little longer,” Shen Zechuan implored him despondently. In that instant, his voice grew hoarse. “Yuanzhuo.”

Yao Wenyu did not answer. He coughed again, and this time, blood soaked his handkerchief. He could no longer hide it.

After a moment of silence, he said, “The census registers in Juexi have been implemented for many years. Jiang Qingshan is a good official. Lanzhou, retain him. That’s the father and mother of Juexi. Commander-in-chief Qi dared to refuse to send troops for the sake of world stability. With her as a prince, you can get the Qidong Five Commanderies to pledge allegiance to you. Although Fei Sheng might have some minor flaws, he’s still a talent you can use. Let him back to Duanzhou, and Duanzhou’s safety can be assured with Yin Chang’s stone monument there. Chengfeng...” Yao Wenyu’s breathing grew heavier. “Chengfeng initially meant to retire after achieving our goals... I’ve already left him a letter... Lanzhou, the new emperor cannot be without a strategic advisor. With Chengfeng’s insights, talents and learning, he... can help you secure your hold on the empire when I'm gone..."

Yao Wenyu was drenched all over in sweat, as if his illness was acting up again; even his complexion was turning white. He raised his hand and grabbed hold of Shen Zechuan's sleeve.

"This empire..." Yao Wenyu made to get up. Both of his eyes reddened as he took his last remaining breaths, "...you have to take the throne! Xun-er is too y-young... It's not his time yet..."

Shen Zechuan held Yao Wenyu's hands back and said slowly in the candlelight, "I'm not cut out to be an emperor."

"You are an overlord, the valiant overlord of the empire." Yao Wenyu said firmly. "You can hand over the empire in the future to come, but at this time, only you, Shen Lanzhou, can sit on the throne! Overturn the old cases and redress the injustices suffered... Pass a new judgment on Shen Wei.." As he gasped for breath, his voice broke, and that clear, jade-like tinkling voice of his turned raspy. Even as he spoke, he was still hastily coughing up blood. "Lanzhou... you're open and aboveboard..."

Shen Zechuan's tears gushed forth. His lips quivered. He couldn't even say a word.

"Once Ce'an re... returns..." Yao Wenyu tightened his grip, "You will have nothing to worry about... I wrote some papers half a year ago. All the yamen in the various territories are included in it, along with some on my humble... opinions of the governance of the people in the eight cities... Take them... From now on..."

Borrowing on Shen Zechuan's strength as the latter supported him, Yao Wenyu suddenly coughed out blood. The splotches of red strains seeped into his sleeves and robe. Not even wiping his blood anymore, he exerted himself with some difficulty to pull the corners of his lips.

"...The empire and state are in your hands."

The burden that Hai Liangyi unloaded, Yao Wenyu shouldered. He did not follow the others' paths; he was his own practitioner. No matter how this world was going to evaluate him, he was still that banished immortal who came riding his donkey.

All his life Yao Yuanzhuo never joined the imperial court as an official—that, he accomplished; Yao Wenyu wanted to fulfill his teacher's wish, and that, he accomplished too. He came to this world naked, and it did not matter if he was broken.

Other than Qiao Tianya, he owed no other.

“If only we could have met earlier...”

Yao Wenyu gazed at the window, where the colored silk ball that he had still yet to throw away was hanging. He smiled wearily and moved his hand with the red thread.

“... Ah.”

Qiao Tianya spurred his horse on and galloped through the heavy snow. With his seven-stringed zither on his back, he broke through the fence and tumbled off his horse under the jeers of the Imperial Army. Fei Sheng came over to help him up. He pushed Fei Sheng away and clambered to his feet in the snow. His gaze passed through the long, long corridor, and he saw that the light at the end had gone out.

Qiao Tianya walked a few steps and tripped over the steps. It was here he fell, and all of a sudden, his shoulders trembled. He looked up at the heavy snow, laughing even as his face was awash in tears.

“... Fucking Heaven! You made a fool of me... and trampled over me...” Qiao Tianya cried uncontrollably. “And I bore it all...”

Why do this to him again?

Qiao Tianya raised his arms and pulled off the seven-stringed zither off his back.

Fei Sheng strode over to stop him, calling out in an urgent voice, “Qiao —”

But it was already too late.

Qiao Tianya abruptly raised his seven-stringed zither high and smashed it down on the steps. The strings of the seven-stringed zither he had cherished all his life snapped. Then the body of the zither cracked and broke into two halves that fell into the snow.

The snowstorm obscured Qiao Tianya’s eyes. His untrammelled hair fluttered in the air. With the breakage of the seven-stringed zither, his heart died, too.

“Since there is no Yao Yuanzhuo in this world,” Qiao Tianya slowly closed his eyes, as if mocking this absurd arrangement, “then the Qiao Songyue of it is dead.”

Fei Sheng chased after Qiao Tianya and asked in the heavy snow, “Where are you going?”

Qiao Tianya did not answer. As he turned around, he undid the sword laden with past gratitude and grudges and stumbled towards the incoming path ahead.

The horse carriage came to a stop. Jiran made his way out under the screen of the carriage and trotted over to catch up with Qiao Tianya. He clapped his hands and expounded the teachings of Buddha in a child-like voice, "Attachments I have not of all in the secular world, so bothered I am not by them all around me. Benefactor, the path ahead has not the hardships of life, only the enlightenment of you. A snap of Buddha's fingers, and the past is all ashes and smoke."

Qiao Tianya looked as though he did not hear him. Jiran followed him, and those pairs of big and small sleeves fluttered in the wind. Together, they disappeared amongst the heavy snow.

Boundless is the sky in the pure land, untainted by worldly concerns.<sup>130</sup>

Shen Zechuan alone guarded the snow-capped eaves, sitting from nightfall until the beckoning of dawn. He heard the sound of snow falling from the eaves. Time seemed to have frozen. He had finally returned to Qudu, from where he gazed at the sky, the past still vivid in his mind.

"Do you know why that year," Shen Zechuan hugged his overcoat and said slowly, "I agreed to Ce'an's request to put on the earring?"

Fei Sheng, who was standing very far behind him, answered, "Because Master and Second Master have a great relationship."

Shen Zechuan raised his hand to break off the plum blossom blocking his way. "... Because I know someone would leave, and those who disappear amidst the heavy snow would never, ever come back again... except for Ce'an."

Xiao Chiye's putting on of the earring for Lanzhou was an explicit expression of his dominance which concealed his affection and love. Every time he cupped Lanzhou's face, his gaze was always so scorching hot and blazingly passionate. This was love that could never waver, desire that could never be concealed.

Shen Zechuan's wearing of the earring that Ce'an gave was similarly a declaration of possession, that he still had tenderness amidst his pain and ruthlessness. This was his gentleness, one that he only gave to Xiao Ce'an.

Fei Sheng did not dare to go too close. After Yuanzhuo and Songyue left one after another, it was rare for Shen Zechuan to show such a mild and genial expression. Shen Zechuan was already standing at the peak of the world. Even if he had yet to wear the crown, he was different from when he was still in Zhongbo. This difference was not because Shen Zechuan or Fei Sheng had changed, but because the place had changed. It was as if even the stairs in this imperial capital that had towered for centuries possessed the power to intimidate.

Fei Sheng racked his brain to coax him. "Master, Princess Consort Xiao and Hereditary Prince are already on the way. They will be able to enter the capital in a few more days."

Shen Zechuan uttered his acknowledgment. Fei Sheng stood in silence.

Sometime later, Shen Zechuan rubbed away the plum blossom he had plucked off. The juice of those fragile and delicate petals dampened the pulps of his fingers. At the same time he lowered his eyes, he took the handkerchief. Squishy noises suddenly sounded from the snow-covered ground. Shen Zechuan had yet to open his mouth when the top of his head was suddenly covered by an overcoat.

Shen Zechuan was momentarily stunned. Subsequently, he was picked up in someone's arms, and the motion revealed a gap in the overcoat. The back of his head was held down, and then he was kissed squarely on the lips.

Fragments of snow landed on the top of Shen Zechuan's nose, but it was all hot between his lips.

Xiao Chiye pulled off the overcoat and laughed. "I—"

Shen Zechuan yanked hard on Xiao Chiye's fur collar. He turned and lowered his head, almost crashing onto his lips.

The travel-worn Xiao Chiye promptly tightened his arms around Lanzhou, holding him so tightly the latter could barely catch his breath.

Shen Zechuan pulled away a little and whispered, "I—"

Xiao Chiye covered the back of Lanzhou's head and kissed him again, throwing all his pining over the few months they were separated into the kiss. He showed his true colors after a moment of masking it and kissed Lanzhou until the tip of Lanzhou's tongue went numb.

Xiao Chiye had long legs and great strength, so it was not at all a strain for him to hug Shen Zechuan in such a way. Shen Zechuan's head was already pushing into the branch of plum blossoms, and the snow on it fell for all it was worth and dropped onto both men's napes. It was so freezing cold they both shivered in unison.

"Man, Qudu is rather cold," Xiao Chiye lamented.

"You're rather hot yourself," Shen Zechuan answered.

The snow on Xiao Chiye's neck slid down along his back. It was so icy cold he wanted to suck in a breath, but he could not bear to part with the man before him, unwilling as he was to let go. All he could do was hop a few times with Shen Zechuan in tow.

With this hop, Shen Zechuan really went right up among the plum blossom branches. For a moment, all the chunks of snow and pieces of flowers came tumbling down, cloaking both men with snow all over their heads and shoulders.

"Xiao'er!" Shen Zechuan pressed haphazardly on Xiao Chiye's face.

Xiao Chiye's vision was obstructed, and as he took a few steps back, he fell over into the thick pile of snow. Puffs of snow sprayed onto Shen Zechuan's face. With his chest heaving, Xiao Chiye cupped Lanzhou's cheek and craned his neck for another mouthful.

"My eldest brother wanted me to stay for a few days in Dajing. I threw off the blanket in the middle of the night and ran away." The teeth that Xiao Chiye exposed appeared unusually sharp. "He is certain to enter the capital in a few days to beat me up."

"Did you come via the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path?" Shen Zechuan suddenly clasped hold of Xiao Chiye's wrist and pressed in closer to ask, "Didn't you see Eldest Sister-in-law and Xun-er on the way here?"

"I did." The center of Xiao Chiye's eyebrows arched up slightly. "But my horse is fast, and it overtook them right there and then on the spot."

Xiao Xun, who was still on the bumpy ride over, leaned over the window.

"What are you looking at?" Lu Guangbai asked.

Xiao Xun expressionlessly pointed at the road ahead. "Second Uncle said he'll be right back after taking a piss."

The row of guards before them simultaneously let loose a "pffft" sound.

Lu Guangbai patted Xiao Xun's head and said, "Your Second Uncle is a jerk, and the words of a jerk cannot be trusted."

Lu Yizhi, who was powdering her face inside the carriage, pulled open the curtain with a "swish". Cutting an imposing figure as she pointed ahead, she commanded, "Charge. Charge quickly. Even if we can't catch up with that brat, we have to make it in time for his dinner!"

Xiao Chiye ran fast, but he still ended up taking a beating from his eldest brother in Qudu. Surprisingly enough, it was Ji Gang whose heart ached a little and subsequently whisked him away.

A few days later, Shen Zechuan organized the documents on his desk. With a brush dipped in ink, he narrated on the blank papers. Under the light of the lamp, he looked back upon the past in the reigning silence and finally straightened out everything that had transpired after the Da Zhou reign of Yongyi.

“During the reign of Yongyi, the Grand Mentor entered the imperial court thrice to serve as an official and assisted the Crown Prince in implementing the census registers.” Xiao Chiye took Shen Zechuan’s hand from behind and wrote it down with him.

In his game of chess with the noble clans, Qi Huilian suffered a defeat because of Qiao Kanghai’s betrayal. Ji Lei and Shen Wei acted under the empress dowager’s orders and forced the Crown Prince to his death at Zhaozui Temple. Since then, Qi Huilian feigned insanity and was imprisoned in Zhaozui Temple. The Eastern Palace’s lineage was thus completely severed.

Later, Shen Wei suspected that the empress dowager was going to get rid of him after he had outlived his usefulness. After repeated days of turning and tossing, Shen Wei spent a huge sum of money to bribe Pan Rugui and gained himself the opportunity to be assigned out of the capital to Zhongbo.

In the same year, in order to save everyone in the Shao clan, Shao Chengbi exploited the advantage accorded to him by his own position and stole the military map of Zhongbo as a gift to Shen Wei. But Shen Wei did not keep his word, resulting in the property confiscation and eventual execution of Qiao Kanghai, as well as the fall of the Shao clan.

Shao Chengbi’s life was saved by Chen Zhen, and the Old Matriarch Shao<sup>131</sup> sent Fengquan away. From then on, Shao Chengbi concealed his identity and lived incognito in Qudu, waiting for the right opportunity.

Shen Wei arrived in Zhongbo, and in order to preserve his life, he passed on the military topographical map of the Zhongbo six prefectures to Amu’er as a gift at the same time he was contacting Amu’er on behalf of the noble clans. In the process of contending for Gedale, he killed his wife, Bai Cha, for Amu’er.

In the third year of the reign of Xiande, Juexi was hit with a drought, and Provincial Administration Commissioner, Jiang Qingshan, ended up owing a huge debt of tens of thousands of taels. At the risk of being charged with a capital crime punishable by death, he opened the granaries and distributed the grains to provide aid relief to the people.

In the same year, Deputy Grand Secretary Hai Liangyi joined forces with Chief Supervising Secretary of the Ministry of Revenue, Xue Xiuzhuo, and the others from the practical doers faction in the various regions to call Hua Siqian to account. Hua Siqian's attempts to ask the noble clans for money fell through. Subsequently, he took a risk out of desperation with Wei Huaigu and used Shen Wei's evasion of war as an opportunity to open up the line of defense at Zhongbo Chashi River to let the Biansha Cavalry into the territory.

When Xiao Chiye wrote to this point, his eyebrows creased slightly into a frown. As he dipped the brush in ink, he said, "In evading the battles, Shen Wei actually was the noble clans' scapegoat. It'd have been better for him to throw in with Amu'er at that time. To date, I still can't figure out why he set himself on fire."

"I originally did not understand it either." Shen Zechuan turned his head aside to look at Xiao Chiye. "It was only when Chengfeng reorganized the Shen clan's genealogical record that I found the reason—the most obvious reason."

Xiao Chiye looked at Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan coughed out the three words, "Shen Zhouji."

Xiao Chiye understood it in a flash. "...That was indeed obvious."

In order to avoid war back then, Shen Wei and Hereditary Prince, Shen Zhouji, strangled the Dunzhou Commander, Tantai Long, to death. Even if they returned to Qudu again, they would be convicted of a crime. He had meant to defect to Amu'er, but Amu'er's cavalry lassoed Shen Zhouji behind the horses and dragged him to his death on the public roads.

Shen Wei was an abandoned pawn that both sides discarded. He had no future, no way out of his predicament.

"Then, in the fourth year of Xiande," Xiao Chiye pressed his chin down on the center of Shen Zechuan's hair, "our Lanzhou entered the capital."

In that instant, the past replayed as if it were yesterday.

Shen Zechuan entered the capital alone, and at the same time, Xiao Jiming, who had rendered meritorious military service, was forced to hand over Xiao Chiye.

The mad dog crushed by hatred and the vicious dog bound with shackles tore into each other in the gloomy rain of Qudu. The metallic taste of blood saturated each other's mouths, so hot it blazed like fire.

Qudu molded and forged Shen Lanzhou and Xiao Ce'an. They were back-to-back blade and shield, and they were also face-to-face passion and desire.

Day was breaking. Xiao Chiye heard the distant toll of the bell. He stroked Shen Zechuan's temple and said with certainty, "From today onwards, my Lanzhou is the common ruler of all in the world. The 560,000 troops in the empire are all under your command. Enter and exit the ceremonial hall and the palace as you please. I, Xiao Ce'an, shall stand in the front hall with my blade in hand to watch over the heroes from all over on your behalf."

Shen Zechuan tilted his head up, and Xiao Chiye raised the emperor crown with the dangling tassels of beads<sup>132</sup> and secured it for him on his head. That deep red robe was adorned with dark gold rims. Once again, Xiao Chiye touched the red jade bead earring on Shen Zechuan's right ear.

Kong Ling, who was outside the hall, knocked thrice on the door.

"And so the hidden blade of talent returns to its sheath." Shen Zechuan's expression was a little indolent. The pulp of his fingers nudged up along the side of Xiao Chiye's arm before grasping hold of Xiao Chiye's chin. He pulled it close, but instead of kissing him, he whispered, "Who made this prince robe of yours?"

Xiao Chiye whispered back, "My secret lover."

Shen Zechuan laughed. He took half a step back and stood side by side with Xiao Chiye in front of the doors. At the very instant the doors opened, Xiao Chiye lifted his hand and gently pushed Shen Zechuan in the back of his waist.

Shen Zechuan strode out and saw the blue dome of heaven awakening. Between the layers and layers of eaves, the former subordinates of the three territories of Zhongbo, Libei, and Qidong all kneeled to the ground. Kong Ling raised the imperial jade seal and took the lead to say, "Long live—"

"Long live, Your Majesty!" Everyone present shouted reverently in unison.

The new sun promptly made an appearance. Rays of light burst through between the eaves and the dangling beads to shine upon Shen Zechuan's face. Shen Zechuan was so dazzling amongst the masses of his subjects no one could look at him directly. He saw the sun rise in the east, heard the wind chimes stirring in the wind, and in that very instant, all sorts of emotions overwhelmed him.

Shen Zechuan erected a new Cangyun Pavilion at the former site of Yulong Terrace. On the left, he set up a civil minister registry, with the names of Qi Huilian, Hai Liangyi, and Yao Wenyu leading the various officials. On the right was the military general register, where the names of Xiao Fangxu, Xiao Jiming, Qi Zhuyin, Lu Guangbai, and Yin Chang were recorded for all posterity. At the end of those neatly arranged portraits were the images of two men of equal standing in the hierarchy.

From then on, all hostilities of war came to an end, and peace ensued. “Jing”<sup>133</sup> was chosen as the title of the reigning dynasty, with Shen Zechuan kicking off the “first year of Chunsheng”.<sup>134</sup>

On this one day, a merry feast was held in the palace. Zhou Gui, who had been simple-hearted and inarticulate for half of his life, was drunk in front of the hall. As he indulged to his heart’s content, he struck the chopsticks in his hand against the wine cup and sang, “from the vast blue sky the egret comes, of waters boundless amidst the mist.”

Midway through, he sighed with emotions and shed tears. Holding Kong Ling’s hands, he said, “After this, I alone will guard Cizhou. You will be here as your chancellor in white...” Having said to this point, he totally disregarded his dignity and burst out crying. “Oh, how difficult this journey has been. Chengfeng, I’m too happy!”

At the side, Fei Sheng lifted his wine cup and clinked cups with them. With a smile, he said, ‘I will return together with Your Excellency to Duanzhou and be my ‘loyal and courageous’ self!’<sup>135</sup>

They burst out laughing, then put their heads together and sobbed.

Wiping his tears, Fei Sheng said, “Blast it. Once I’m gone, who’s going to take care of Master?!”

“His Lord...” Tantai Hu wiped his tears too and corrected himself in a gruff voice, “With my Second Master assuming personal command in the capital, not even a fly can get close to His Majesty. The frick you’re worried for?!”

On hearing them, Gao Zhongxiong suddenly started bawling.

“The heck with you?!” Yu Xiaozai hurriedly asked him. “You’re not leaving anyway!”

"I thought of Yuanzhuo." Gao Zhongxiong covered his face and wiped his tears. He bowed to Tantai Hu. "Yuanzhuo wanted me to give Hunu to you. You, you must treat it well!"

"Fuck." Tantai Hu wiped his face again, but said with a solemn expression, "I understand Mister Yuanzhuo's intent. I have a bad temper. By giving me the cat, it'd be like seeing him whenever I see it in the future, and I'll think thrice before I act and won't dare to be reckless."

Huo Lingyun downed several cups of wine and said in a quiet voice, "I wonder where Commander Qiao has gone..."

"After Qiao Tianya left, Master sealed Yang Shan Xue away in a chest. This kindness is enough!" Fei Sheng forced himself to cheer up and asked, "Say, why are Master and Second Master missing?"

The emperor crown did not fall off, but the dangling beads collided against one another, making an intriguing rocking and swaying sound in the darkness. The throne was mind-blowingly high; it was the most unattainable place in the world far beyond anyone's reach. Shen Zechuan was pinned onto it, his head tilted back.

Sweat intermingled. At every thrust, the jade earring would swing.

Moonlight that shone through the window paved only the ground before the steps. Shen Zechuan's gaze melted in the darkness. His robe had not been pried off him. He reached out his hands and clenched the robe on Xiao Chiye's back tightly.

This was the most formal and solemn place in the world, and the most coveted position of all in the world. But Shen Zechuan did not care, and neither did Xiao Chiye.

That blazing, scalding sensual sensation extended all the way down to the toes.

The wolf on Xiao Chiye's back was hurting from being scratched, but he loved this pain.

It was here Shen Zechuan melted as Xiao Chiye held his jade earring in his mouth. All he could do was struggle to squint his expressive eyes. Time after time, he called out "A-Ye", ignorant of the gravity of his actions.

Xiao Chiye braced himself against the back of the throne with his hand and trapped Lanzhou in the crooks of his arms. Biting him, he let loose a chuckle amid the roughness of his motions and responded, "... Lanzhou."

He secured both of Shen Zechuan's hands in place.

Lanzhou.

Oh, Lanzhou.

The crown among Shen Zechuan's hair finally fell off and tumbled down the throne, the dangling beads "tinkling" as it rolled along the steps. Shen Zechuan liked this sound. Xiao Chiye sniffed at him, displaying a hint of aroused ruthlessness at this close distance. "Got you captive."

Shen Zechuan's fingertips that could still move slide around the area between Xiao Chiye's thumb and index finger, as if in compliment and encouragement.

Shen Zechuan was so dangerous and deadly. His slightly dazed and disoriented eyes clung to the side of Xiao Chiye's cheek, seemingly hidden in the shadow of the alpha wolf. This was Xiao Chiye's jade earring.

Both men trampled on power underfoot, crushing it as they reveled in this long-awaited feverish passion. All those strife were too far off to be visible.

From now on, they had each other to depend on.

Through weal and woe.

Till time eternal.

Author's Note:

On the whole, the story adopts the Ming system. The local government system has been simplified down to the jurisdiction of the prefectural yamen (or office, a form of the administrative division headed by the prefectural prefect), with the clerks (also known in here as the functionaries) of the Qing system thrown into the mix and with the role of the group of advisors and aides emphasized. I've slacked off on many details that need closer study, so they are not all that rigorous. In writing the plot, my enjoyment takes precedence first and foremost.

My estimation for the length of the story was wrong every time, and it took longer than I thought to tie it all up for the conclusion. I was wrapping up when there was only a page left in the story outline. It was laborious to write in-depth with the various threads in a jumble, and deciding between going into detail or simplifying it was another problem. Often, I felt I can finish it in one go, but when I really started writing, it felt like it was still a long way off. I tried my best to restrain the melodrama in the later stages when the characters step offstage, and I didn't rehash all the hints of foreshadowing I've dropped before, but I'm still not that satisfied. I received a lot of suggestions during the serialization. Thank you very much. And thank you for the ten months of companionship.

Lianyin's Note:

Ten(10) months for the serialization of the novel, twenty-nine(29) months for the translation. :V There will be some extras next (which the author posted on her Weibo before), and then it'll be editing time to clean up the translation, revise and standardize terms, weed out typos, improve parts I feel are still lacking, etc. The final version will be based on the Traditional Chinese version which will probably be released toward the end of this year. So until then, your patience and understanding are still much appreciated! Also, feel free to poke me if you have any suggestions or feedback. Last but not least, thank you for putting up with me/us all this time and for joining the Cezhou ride! (◡_◡)

Jia's Note:

Hope everyone had a good time following Cezhou's story! <3 Joining this tl made me realize how much more I have to go in my tl journey, so thank you everyone for putting up with any inadequacies on my part. Let's all give lianyin a big hug and kiss hehehehe see you in the extras!

Note:

The last part is the uncensored version combined with newly added text in the censored version. As mentioned before, final version will be based on the Traditional Chinese copy when it is released.

Credits: Bless Ami and Yu for letting me bounce ideas off them! <3

将进酒

原作：唐酒卿

广播剧第一季

